Commander's Testimony

Bucher has testified he did not have the power to resist since the Pueblo spy ship was hopelessly outgunned by four and a subchaser.

It was all Bucher's idea and not requested by the Navy, Harvey said, although Adm. Thomas H. Moorer's distress at the public reaction to the court's warning figured in the Pueblo skipper's decision. Moorer Chief of Naval Operations, said in a weekend speech the Navy is looking only for "facts, not a scapegoat."

Asked if he believed the Court of Inquiry would recommend Bucher for court-martial, Harvey said: "It is premature to make any comment along this line."

Wants Another Command

Harvey did say, however, that Bucher "definitely wants another command." His attorney added that Bucher "evidences to me everything you would want to see in a Navy commander."

Harvey said that Bucher, "in order of priority," wants to Press reaction and the 300 get the court proceedings over

He views the Court of Inquiry "as an opportunity to clear any slur which may have been on his name and to get the facts before the Nation," Harvey said.

Bucher is known to feel grateful to Vice Adm. Harold G. Bowen Jr., president of the Court of Inquiry, for letting him give his story in straight narrative form rather than through questions and answers. Capt. James E. Keys, Bucher's Navy attorney, said today that such a procedure is "somewhat different but not improper."

Capt. Vincent Thomas, Pacific Command public information officer who heads press operations here, estimated today that the inquiry would last another four weeks.

Other Witnesses

Bucher attended this morning's closed-door session but did not testify. Witnesses in the morning session were Capt. Forrest A. Pease, who was chief of staff at U.S. Naval Forces Japan last Jan. 11 when the Pueblo sailed for waters off North Korea, and Capt. William H. Everett, the Naval Command's operations officer at the time.

Scheduled to testify next is Rear Adm. Frank L. Johnson who was commander of U.S. Naval Forces Japan during the Pueblo crisis. It was Johnson who, as operational commander of the Pueblo, had to decide how to respond to the Pueblo's plight when it called for help.

Harvey said during today's press conference that "the record of these proceedings will contain the full story" of the Pueblo incident, so there would be no point in holding separate hearings on it. This inquiry, he said, "will answer all the questions that need to be answered."
