cut in on Colby's "fallout shelter" program, with the benefit of hindsight, although in the days of which he writes "fallout" was not the primary danger they were to shelter against. The "left" he says was "turned to" in a bitterly against the administration on this proposal, made in May, eight after the Bay of Pigs. It will be interesting to see if it will permit Sch. acknowledge the wisdom and accuracy of the objections to this program which was, once its propaganda benefit was reaped, quietly dropped, for, as he writes (it really was to those not engaged in the propaganda) it would not, as he alleged, save the lives of 20 or 30 million people if war came. An additional reason for this program may be the economic philosophy of the administration, spending which Sch has earlier explained at some length. While not conceding that the program was a miserable flop that inspired the high places of the world in the national character, let alone what our his own, Sch calls a "mission", instead of acknowledging his to the administration's view of the that Kennedy is actually expecting that because "he would win & win him" Alfred Kazin should not have written an article in "The American Scholar" which, apparently, he didn't like. Soh. is careful to not even indicate the nature or contents of Kazin's piece It is obvious that both in advance of all the time he was in the White House, Kazin made his beliefs & attitudes clear. Did R expect debate that Soh. might well impute the integrity of those upon whom he unhesitatingly made his points & dishonest attacks they cannot possibly answer
