U.S. AND KOREA STILL DISAGREE

Panmunjom Talks Bring No Breakthrough

WASHINGTON (AP) — Another meeting with North Korean officials at Panmunjom has brought no breakthrough toward release of the crew of the USS Pueblo, the State Department said Tuesday.

The two sides met for two hours and 43 minutes Monday night, Washington time, but press officer Robert J. McCloskey said he had no progress to report.

The family of one of the 82 surviving crewmen from the Pueblo picketed the State Department meantime, but was refused a meeting with Secretary of State dean Rusk. McCloskey said Rusk had a full schedule of meetings occupying his time.

SON HELD CAPTIVE

"I want my son without an apology," read the sign carried by Mrs. Warren Hayes of Columbus, Ohio, whose son Lee, 26, is one of the captured crewmen of the intelligence-gathering ship. North Korea has demanded an apology from the United States as a condition for releasing the men.

But Mrs. Hayes said she did not think her son would be sent home even if the United States did apologize and accept North Korea's claim that the ship had intruded into North Korean waters. She said a U.S. apology had not brought release of 11 Americans from Cambodia.

MAY JEOPARDIZE

An apology on behalf of the Pueblo crewmen, she said, "may jeopardize them more than we have done already by abandoning them for eight months."

Picketing with Mrs. Hayes were her husband, a Columbus plumber; their 13-year-old son, Scott; and the Rev. Paul D. Linstrom of Prospect Heights, Ill., head of the "Remember the Pueblo Committee" formed to push for return of the crewmen.

The family, unable to see Rusk, declined an offer to meet with Ambassador Winthrop Brown, senior State Department official handling the Pueblo case.

They said they planned also to seek a meeting with President Johnson, but the white House said they had no appointment.
