Recalling the Bay of Pigs

TWENTY-FIVE YEARS ago today the worst cover-action fiasco in American history occurred when a brigade of CIA-sponsored Cuban exiles landed at the Bay of Pigs. The memory of that day haunts me because I was one of the CIA officers who planned the operation. But I recall more vividly and painfully the 19th of April, 1961, when after two days we knew the defeat was beyond salvage. In Washington we listened to the final radio report from the Cuban commander on the beach. His invasion force of 1,400 Cuban exiles had been routed. He reported that he was standing in the shallows, that he was about to abandon his gear and head for the swamp.

Then he cursed the United States government, and he cursed us as individuals.

The question about the Bay of Pigs most frequently asked — particularly by those who were young or not even born at the time — is a simple one: Why did it fail?

There is no simple, single answer.

Some history should be set straight. It has often been argued that the root cause of the disaster was that the CIA promised President Eisenhower, and, after his inauguration, President Kennedy that a spontaneous uprising would be sparked in Cuba by the landing at the Bay of Pigs. That has become a durable myth; but it is a myth. The Bay of Pigs operational plan was based on the 1954 successful covert action, in which I was also involved, that led to the overthrow of the Arbenz government in Guatemala. No one in a responsible position ever contemplated a sudden victory in the Guatemalan endeavor. And it didn't occur until enough Guatemalans were convinced the invading army was well entrenched and the time had arrived to hop on the bandwagon. Nor, in the Cuban operation did anyone from the lowest operator to the Director of Central Intelligence, Allen Dulles, believe that immediate uprisings would topple the charismatic Fidel Castro.

Then why did it fail? For the first few years after the Bay of Pigs my observations were too subjective to be trusted. In 1975, however, I mustered as much objectivity as I could to list four principal reasons for the failure:

□ First, Kennedy's political advisers successfully argued that the CIA's original plan to land at a small town called Trinidad near Cuban mountains would make the operation unacceptable "noisy"; thus the change to the isolated, swampy landing site at the Bay of Pigs.

□ Next, the ambassador to the United Nations, Adlai Stevenson, was not thoroughly informed of pre-invasion air strikes against Cuba. CIA sorties by exile pilots who claimed they were detecting from Castro's air force. Stevenson was understandably incensed after he denied charges by Cuba's foreign minister that the planes were on CIA-supported missions. His protest to Kennedy, who admired him, might have been critical in the decision to truncate the operation.

□ Then, those of us within CIA

— including Allen Dulles and Richard Bissell, the senior action officer of the operation — should have ignored the agency's "can do" and "good soldier" tradition and told the White House that an operation of the dimensions of the Bay of Pigs, if to be conducted at all, should be managed openly by the Pentagon and not by a secret army.

□ Finally, Kennedy decided at zero hour to cancel the air cover which the 1,400 Cuban exiles in the invasion amphibious force had been promised.

Now, after pondering the sad and replied simply, "They had no air support."

Years after the event a man who had worked with me on the project explained what he had decided about the Bay of Pigs. "It was inevitable," he said. "The fiasco I mean. The disaster. If it hadn't been the Bay of Pigs it would have been something else sometime in the future. In 1953 Kermit Roosevelt and a few fellows manipulated that crowd which toppled Mossadegh in Iran without any trouble at all. Then in 1954 we took care of Eisenhower's little problem in Guatemala. So easy, it seemed. All those successes just had to lead to a failure eventually, because the system kept calling on us for more and more even when it should have been obvious that secret shenanigans couldn't do what armies are supposed to do."

"If it hadn't been that time at the Bay of Pigs," he concluded, "it would have been somewhere else at some other time."

We didn't call them on that in 1961, but the exiles stranded on the beach at the Bay of Pigs were our "contras." We should have scrapped the operation or, once committed to it followed through with enough support that our "contras" would never have only the sole option of heading for the swamp.

David Atlee Phillips is a former chief of the CIA's Latin American and Caribbean operations.

Despite all the many dishonesties without which the CIA and its people cannot pretend to justify the unjustifiable and on which they depend, David Phillips makes a remarkable admission in this oped piece in the 4/17/86 Baltimore Sun: the CIA did expect U.S. troops to follow their revanchist Cubans at the Bay of Pigs, marked in column 4. Aside from all that Phillips must omit and therefore does ~~omit~~ omit, like the steadfast JFK refusal of any direct U.S. involvement and the JCS involvement in the planning and decisions, a few illustrations of the deliberateness of his dishonesties here are:

Adlai Stevenson was not thoroughly (emph. added) of pre-invasion air strikes against Cuba by exile pilots..." Truth is,

Stevenson wasn't informed at all & had been misled. "Kennedy decided a zero hour to cancel the air cover which ~~had been promised~~ the 1400

Cuban exiles in the invasion amph-bious force had been promised." NOT by JFK, the enduring CIA fiction, but by the CIA, contrary to JFK's expressed limitations. And when in time of extremity JFK did authorize air support the Navy and the Cubans/CIA missed out on timing &

it was wasted....In effect Phillips admits that the CIA does make policy and not merely carry out policy handed down to it because JFK almost always, perhaps 100% of the time, insisted that there not be any direct U.S. involvement, to the degree that no CIA people were to have landed with the invasion force (an injunction it also ignored). According to undisputed published accounts, like Haynes Johnson's, Dulles - here said by Phillips to have expected U.S. forces-

JFK was quite explicit. It thus appears that the CIA's actual plot was to get the U.S. directly and militarily involved in the fiasco it deliberately created.

And that could have led to World War III, would have if the USSR decided to honor its treaty obligations to Cuba. Insofar as Phillips claim that the Bay of Pigs scheme was based on his overthrow of the Arbenz government in Guatemala is concerned, there is no truth at all, which makes me wonder why he says it.
