Dear David,

Your Friday's card and the enclosed column of the 15th make me wonder what your readers must have wondered about, even what the title of the book is and how - if at all - it can be obtained.

For me this sort of thing and the inaccuracies become an enormous futility.

I care naught for personal publicity.

Lesar borrowed the money to pay the printer so that people could read this material.

You write a column. No matter how few people may have read it or wanted to obtain the entire document, not just what you said of the work, you made it impossible for them when there is no single commercial radio station that has not told its audience the price and how to get it.

You say I did this so that everyone could benefit, which is true. But you then misidentify the document itself, calling it by a contraction of the book's subtitle. So, should any of your readers have wanted to spend much more than the cost of the book to get a copy of the transcript from the government, you made that impossible, too.

Yet in your card you complain that "No one will take time to talk." Should I again?

Especially when you either don't take time to read or are unable to comprehend.

The unidentified "friends" of mine you quote interest me. If you are not under restraint, and I don't think that on this you should be, I'd be interested in knowing who they are. These are things I do not say.

The Washington newsmen Ben Waters you quote is unknown to me. If he wrote of this book, as the close of your column suggests, I'd be interested in seeing what he wrote.

Following this you close with a crack at the WxPost. Your timing could not have been worse. On this book they had and syndicated a very good, straight story of not less than two columns.

All of this and what I do not recognize is much of a disappointment to me.

Sincerely,
