

7/1/68 re 6/30 Tommy Baumler, at Barbara's last night, aid that two weeks ago Deyahn had come into his office, laid a close to perfect case of documented evidence on his desk and asked him to sue over an accident that turned out to be the one in which she was knocked off her scooter. He said he didn't trust her statement that no other lawyer was involved so he had his secretary immediately draw up an affidavit in which she swore that she had no other lawyer on it. Her story to him is that she had fired Bernstein.

What didn't seem to bother Tommy a bit is that he was prepared to have her intradicted. How could a client whose intradiction is legally required execute a meaningful affidavit?

Tommy's sole purpose, he made clear, was to have something to keep him inside the bar practises.
