Dear Mr. Waring,

Your letter of the 25th has been forwarded from our old address.

Much as I would like to accede to your request, it is impossible. If I did, I would be doing nothing else. The closest I can come is to make an appearance, a speech, and conduct seminars at the same time. Generally, the standard honorarium is adequate.

I have continued my work from the time of the assassination. It is without subsidy. The only income from it is slight, thousands of dollars short of the cost. It is from the sale of the books I had to publish myself (list enclosed). Aside from what is in my head, some 15 file cabinets and books I have not been able to print, it is all I can provide.

I think if you stop and think for a moment, you will come to understand it is not unwillingness but impossibility that precludes my doing what you ask.

It is good that you are interested. This is one of the turning points of history. It is also the crisis of official credibility. Think of what has happened since.

Best regards,

Harold Weisberg
