

2 Frenchmen Back The Warren Report; Most Are Doubtful

Special to The New York Times

PARIS, Nov. 22 — A small French publishing house is about to publish a small book attacking the attackers of the Warren Commission report on President Kennedy's assassination.

A well-known court reporter wrote in Le Figaro yesterday that it was easier to make a case against Mark Lane, author of the best-selling "Rush to Judgment," than against the commission.

But these two are exceptions. By and large, the major French newspapers and magazines marked the third anniversary today with long articles casting doubt on the commission for one reason or another. France has been the source of the most agitation and suspicion about the case from the start, and it continues to be.

Two newspapers, the prestigious Le Monde and the mass circulation France-Soir, sent reporters from Paris to Texas for the anniversary. This morning Le Figaro carried a half-page article by its New York reporter, Leo Sauvage, the author of one of the dozen-odd doubting books that have been published.

Paris-Match, weekly magazine, has a cover photograph of the Kennedys and Gov. John B. Connally Jr. in their limousine just before the fatal moment, and 18 pages of photographs and re-examination inside.

Candide, a pro-Gaullist weekly magazine, has an eight-page analysis headlined "The Mystery Is in This Bullet," showing a photograph of the bullet that, the commission said, hit the President and the Governor.

Lane Unavailable

Mr. Lane could not be reached immediately for comment upon Mr. Duhamel's book or Mr. de Coquet's criticism in Le Figaro.
