Dear Mr. Weisberg:

After reading your October 8 letter, I reviewed all our prior correspondence. It seems to me that at least in my own mind I have been consistent throughout. I think I can understand how you may have misinterpreted my intentions but, as I have said I never did intend that Dell would bear your legal expense, and I don't believe I ever intimated that such would be the case.

Under your agreement with Dell, we have the right to defend ourselves at your expense with counsel of our choosing. That is what was done, and we do not see any compelling reason to change our minds at this juncture.

Sincerely,

DELL PUBLISHING CO., INC.
