LBJ Aides Disavow System

By Jules Witcover 7/17/73

The White House reported yesterday that the Nixon Administration system of automatically recording Mr. Nixon's conversations in several offices and on his phones is "similar" to one used in the previous administration.

But Johnson administration officials quickly said they knew nothing of it.

A spokesman for the Secret Service, which installed the system for the Nixon administration, said if there was one in place during the Johnson years, the Secret Service didn't put it there.

Harry Middleton, director of the Lyndon B. Johnson Library in Austin, Texas, said through a federal government spokesman that there is a section in the library that "reflects selective telephone conversations" between Mr. Johnson and others.

Some of them, he said, "were recorded manually by a secretary, some by dictaphone belt." Also, he said, there were "a limited number of meetings recorded in 1968 in the Cabinet room. Most of these concerned national security matters."

White House confirmation of the practice of automatic recording under Mr. Nixon, revealed yesterday in testimony by White House aide Alexander Butterfield, came in a short letter from J. Fred Buzhardt, special counsel to Mr. Nixon, to Sen. Sam J. Ervin Jr. (D-N.C.), chairman of the Senate Watergate committee.

Mr. Nixon's conversations have been recorded "since the spring of 1971," Buzhardt wrote. "I am advised that this system, which is still in use, is similar to that employed by the last administration and which had been discontinued from 1969 until the spring of 1971."

Wonders of Watergate

Wonders of Watergate do not cease. Now the investigating senators have stumbled on to the ultimate witness—the one who can reliably sort out the conflicting charges, reconcile all the confusion and contradiction, save the President or maybe sink him.

It's not John Dean or John Mitchell, not Haldeman or Ehrlichman, not even President Nixon himself. In the search for truth, they have all been upstaged, appropriately enough, by an electronic gizmo—a tape recorder that faithfully eavesdropped on all presidential conversations.

If the White House will turn loose the spools, they could answer countless questions surrounding what the President knew about Watergate and when, which has become the principal issue of the Senate investigation.

Samuel Dash, the committee's chief counsel, smiled like a cat licking canary feathers from his mouth. "We now know there's a complete record of all these meetings," Dash said. "I don't think you have to draw a line and add it up."

The startling revelation that the Oval Office has big ears was popped out yesterday by a reluctant White House alumnus named Alexander Butterfield, who used to arrange for security and historical archives, among other matters, when he was a deputy assistant to the President.

Some Say They Don't Mind

Public figures ranging from George Meany to George Romney reacted with incredulity yesterday to testimony that President Nixon had tape-recorded conversations and telephone calls without consent.

Present Nixon administration Cabinet members, while refraining from direct criticism of the President, said to a man that they didn't know their conversations were being recorded.

"No kidding," said former Attorney General Richard G. Kleindienst in a voice of astonishment.

Kleindienst, reached at a hotel in London where he is on a business trip, said he was not aware of the practice and would "have no further comment on it . . . because of my personal relationship with the President."

"I'm literally astonished, I'm incredulous," said Robert H. Finch, longtime Nixon confidant and a former White House counselor and Health, Education and Welfare Secretary. "I remember being told by several sources that Lyndon Johnson had an arrangement like that but it had been discontinued. I assumed that was the case."

Former Interior Secretary Walter J. Hickel, who was dismissed by the President after publicly protesting the administration's Vietnam policies, said that "America will be sick at heart" over the disclosures and added:

"I was trying to get my message to the White House anyway. All they had to do was ask."

Another ex-Cabinet member, former Housing and Urban Development Secretary Romney, said that "from a historical standpoint" he was pleased that his views were recorded but had never suspected that this was the case.

"I had some things to say I thought needed saying," said Romney. "They weren't always listened to, but I'm glad they were recorded. I hope they don't get edited."

AFL-CIO President Meany, a White House guest on several occasions, said he did not have "the slightest idea" that any of his conversations were recorded. Referring to the testimony of former White House aide Alexander P. Butterfield, Meany said:

"If this man were not testifying under oath, I would not believe it, because it is so fantastic as to be almost beyond belief. God bless the blunderers at Watergate. If they hadn't been so clumsy, America would never have known about things like this,"

Democratic leaders in the Congress were critical of the recordings, though most said they would not have objected if they had been told in advance.

"I'm not surprised but I don't like it," said Senate Democratic Leader Mike Mansfield of Montana. "I wouldn't have minded if they told me."

The member of congress who seemed least surprised of all was Sen. Barry Goldwater (R-Ariz.), who said through a spokesman that he regarded recording conversations for historical purposes as appropriate but believes that people who are being recorded should be notified in advance.

The spokesman said Goldwater was not surprised "for a very strange reason . . . One conversation he had in the Oval Office was reported so precisely by Jack Anderson that he felt there had to be a recording device in operation at the time; there was not a comma out of place."

Goldwater told the President this at the time, the spokesman said, adding that the source of the story must be a very well-placed leak.

Sen. George McGovern (D-S.D.) the 1972 Democratic presidential candidate, called the practice "a violation on privacy." Sen. Bob Dole (R-Kan.), the Republican national chairman during the 1972 campaign, said that he also had not known of the recordings but joked, "I'm glad I always nodded when talking to the President."

On the House side, Speaker Carl Albert (D-Okla.) said "that if this kind of thing did go on it was an outrage, almost beyond belief."

Minority Leader Gerald Ford (R-Mich.) issued a statement in which he said he was never aware of the tape recordings but didn't have any objections.

"I have never said anything to any President that could not be a matter of public record," Ford said. "I, personally, therefore, see nothing wrong with the practice."

Senate Republican leader Hugh Scott of Pennsylvania said he didn't know about the recordings "but always assumed, as far as phone calls are concerned, that there must be some method of keeping a record."

... "it was an outrage"

Housing and Urban Development Secretary James T. Lynn, said he didn't know that his conversations with the President were being taped but added:

"That doesn't bother me a bit."

Interior Secretary Rogers C. B. Morton and Health Education and Welfare Secretary Caspar W. Weinberger said they hadn't been aware of the practice but declined further comment. Agriculture Secretary Earl Butz and William D. Ruckelshaus, former Environmental Protection Agency administrator and former acting director of the FBI, declined comment.

RICHARD G. KLEINDIENST
... "no kidding"

A close friend of the late FBI director J. Edgar Hoover said "for sure" that Hoover had not known of the practice.

And a spokesman for Charles Colson, the controversial former special counsel for President Nixon, said that Colson also hadn't known about the recordings.

In responding to the Butterfield disclosure, Finch said that "those of us who were present at various meetings were asked to jot down our notes and get them into the central files for the presidential records.

"I assumed this would have fulfilled any historical requirements," Finch added. "I'm quite surprised."

Herbert G. Klein, the departing communications director for the Nixon administration, said that he had not been aware of the recordings and agreed that "most people assumed" that history was preserved by the note-taking.

However, Klein said the Butterfield testimony "basically indicates that the major interest was to preserve the history of the presidency."

In Hickel's view this view of history will not be a fair one to the people who didn't know they were being tape-recorded.

GEORGE MEANY
... "almost beyond belief"

"If one person knows the conversation is being taped, he's speaking for history and self-protection," Hickel said. "The other person should know it as a matter of self-protection."

House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Wilbur Mills (D-Ark.) believes that the party being taped also should know about it for reasons of language.

"I'd have appreciated it if he'd have let me know ahead of time," said Mills. "My English would have been better."
