

One of what was later to become known, Nixon's private army of private spies privately paid for by working directly for him under Ehrlichman, gave a simple, professional evaluation of the first build to burst, that zany assault on the Democratic offices: If a real pro had been given the job of tapping and bugging, " he wouldn't have walked in with an army, that's for sure."