WASHINGTON. — The Watergate burglary and espionage mission at Democratic Party headquarters was actually part of a widespread project in which documents were photographed in the Embassy of Chile and several liberal Democratic senators were kept under electronic surveillance, according to a source close to the defendants.

The operation at the Embassy of Chile in Washington involved three men, the source said. One pulled documents from the files, one photographed the documents, and one placed them back in the files.

EMBASSY OFFICIALS have said that last May their chancery was burglarized and their files searched.

The source, a person well acquainted with the activities of the Watergate defendants, made the information available on the condition that his name not be used.

Among the Senators whose activities were in some way allegedly monitored were Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (D., Mont.), Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman J. William Fulbright (D., Ark.) and Sen. Frank Church (D., Idaho).

THE SOURCE ALSO said that Sol Linowitz, former U. S. Ambassador to the Organization of American States, was kept under similar surveillance. And the source said that some surveillance work was done at the Presidential campaign headquarters of Sen. George McGovern (D., S. D.) by members of the Watergate team prior to their arrests inside Democratic Party headquarters June 17.

The seven defendants in the Watergate case go on trial Monday in U. S. District Court here.

It also has been learned that:

The two men, who have not been indicted, are Felipe De Diego, a Cuban exile and Bay of Pigs veteran now in Miami, and Reinaldo Pico, who fled to Venezuela after the Watergate break-in and is believed still there.

-FEDERAL INVESTIGATORS have obtained a daily diary that was being written by one of the Watergate defendants, Eugenio Martinez.

Existence of Martinez' diary, written without the knowledge of his cohorts, indicates that the Central Intelligence Agency — or at least a CIA case officer — may have been monitoring the activities of the Watergate team.

Martinez has continued to do work for the CIA in the years following his part in the Bay of Pigs affair, according to a well-informed defense source in the case. The source says that Martinez confessed to his fellow defendants that he had been keeping the diary after it was seized by Federal officials.

De Diego could be a surprise government witness in the Watergate trial. He was granted immunity and was questioned both by the Grand Jury investigating the case and by the FBI. De Diego, 43, is a real estate salesman who was employed in the real estate office of Bernard L. Barker, one of the Watergate defendants.
