

Work Crews Sift Through Wreck

CHICAGO (AP) — Work crews labored Sunday to protect residents from falling walls as they sifted through rubble left by the crash Friday of a United Air Lines jet in a Southwest Side neighborhood.

A spokesman for the National Transportation Safety Board (NTSB) said workers were securing walls left standing precariously amidst the row of neat bungalows to prevent their falling on undamaged houses nearby. For some of the homes hit by the aircraft and engulfed in flames after the crash, one wall was all that was left.

The tail section of the plane was still sticking out of the debris.

The crash took the lives of 45 persons, including two residents of the neighborhood about a mile from Midway Airport, where the Boeing 737 jet was bound from Washington, D.C.

Firemen sifting through the rubble Saturday found in the wreckage a purse containing $10,585 in cash. Articles in the purse led police to believe it belonged to Mrs. E. Howard Hunt of Potomac, Md., a passenger who was killed in the crash.

Mrs. Hunt's husband, a former consultant for the Nixon administration, was indicted Sept. 15 on charges of conspiracy to break into Democratic headquarters, commit burglary and intercept and disclose telephone communications, and for possession of eavesdropping equipment.

Harold Carlstead, a certified public accountant, said Mrs. Hunt was bringing the $10,000 to Chicago to transact a business deal with him. He would not disclose the nature of the deal.

Hunt flew to Chicago Friday to identify the body of his wife. He returned Saturday to Washington.

Hunt was not among the five persons arrested inside Democratic offices in the Watergate office building.
