The Weekend Collapse: W. Clement Stone beat the Senate Watergate committee and special prosecutor Archibald Cox to the punch by making full disclosure of his $7 million in campaign contributions and loans. Stone, as the No. 1 political angel, undoubtedly will be summoned to testify by both the committee and Cox when each gets around to announced plans to investigate campaign funding. . . . One practice that will come under study will be the dodge employed by both political parties in establishing dubious committees during a presidential campaign, which are little more than paper organizations, to accept the maximum contribution of $3,000 from an individual (or $6,000 from a couple). Setting up hundreds of these committees enables the wealthy to circumvent the intent of the law.
