Senator Edward M. Kennedy
says about this book:

"If this book were a novel, one would have to say that the authors had a very vivid imagination. But their tale is all too true. It details both the extent to which the continuing war in Asia has driven men and women of conscience to extremes of dissent and the degree to which the massive power of the federal establishment has been used to surveil, and snare, indict, and prosecute members of the anti-war movement. For those who doubt that our government really wanted to give the impression that 'there is an agent behind every mailbox,' this book gives the story of one agent literally behind one mailbox.

Gary Wills, author of 'Nixon Agonistes' and
'Bare Ruined Choirs',
says about this book:

"The Nelson-Ostrow book is a gem of journalistic sleuthing. They stick to facts, and venture no broad reflections; but the story they unfold bears an eerie resemblance to the course of our war in Vietnam."
