Hypnosis In Kennedy Investigation

New Orleans

District Attorney James Garrison's office yesterday asked Dean Andrews Jr. to undergo hypnosis or take a lie detector test to determine if he can identify a mysterious figure in the Kennedy assassination probe.

Andrews' attorneys said that they had advised him to refuse to take either test.

Andrews, a lawyer, once told the Warren Commission that a "Clay Bertrand" telephoned him soon after President Kennedy's death and asked him to represent Lee Harvey Oswald. The Warren Commission identified Oswald as the lone assassin.

The commission never was able to locate Bertrand.

Garrison charged in a search warrant application last week that Clay Bertrand was an alias used by Clay L. Shaw, wealthy retired managing director of the International Trade Mart here.

Shaw was arrested March 1 on murder conspiracy charges growing out of Garrison's investigation and released on $10,000 bond.

Andrews, who has been questioned both by Garrison's staff and the Orleans Parish (county) grand jury, has said he does not know if Shaw and Bertrand are the same person. Shaw publicly denied he ever used an alias.

In asking Andrews to take a lie detector test, the district attorney's office offered him a choice of a polygraph (conventional lie detector), hypnosis or truth serum (sodium pentothal).

Andrews, who had been questioned both by Garrison's staff and the Orleans Parish grand jury, said he told the Warren Commission three years ago he did not know if Shaw and Bertrand are the same person.
