New York

Governor Nelson A. Rockefeller, like all major presidential candidates moving under heavy Secret Service guard, said yesterday he has "no fear" and will campaign in his old style — right down among the people.

"If a presidential candidate cannot expose himself to the people," he said, "then we have lost the greatest strength America possesses — the freedom to go out and be with the people."

Rockefeller was assigned 20 Secret Service agents as part of security precautions ordered by President Johnson after Senator Robert F. Kennedy's assassination.

Rockefeller said he would resume campaigning next week, at a date to be announced. He said that he would redouble his efforts to unite the country.

"Those of us who remain," he said, "should give the leadership to unite the country, to overcome the senseless violence in the country, of binding up the wounds of the nation. I will devote myself to this purpose."

At a crowded news conference, accompanied by his wife, the governor said that despite the tragedy he does not believe the nation is a "sick society."

"I don't think that the whole of American society needs to feel guilty," he added.

"I have no fear," he said. "None of us can be intimidated. All of us must serve our country as best we can no matter the risks. Let us not cringe."
