

Lindsay Tells British U.S. Seeks Another 'Compassionate' Leader

By SETH S. KING

Mayor Lindsay told the people of Britain last night that America was searching for a man who could offer the same kind of leadership that Senator Robert F. Kennedy had given — "compassionate, determined and couched in the language of all groups."

Mr. Lindsay, with Roy Wilkins, executive director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, and Arthur M. Schlesinger Jr., the historian, took part in a British Broadcasting Company program carried by satellite from the National Broadcasting Company studio in New York.

Mr. Lindsay said he did not believe the murder of Senator Kennedy would produce a swing to extreme conservatism in the United States.

The Mayor declared: "There are enough people who know very well that the survival of America depends on getting on with the job of providing better schooling, more jobs and more job opportunities for those who have been excluded. We have no other choice.

"We are searching for the kind of leader Senator Kennedy was, one who will take us out of the Vietnam war and set the standards that will offer an alternative to violence. We must choose a Presidential candidate who will do this."

Asked if the United States had run out of the time needed to resolve its problems, Mr. Lindsay replied that America was still young and vigorous and "would prevail."

Mr. Wilkins said that with the death of Senator Kennedy the Negroes of America felt "their friend is gone, the man who spoke up for them is gone."

He said he would not pretend to predict what Negro voters would do now.
