George H. W. Bush of Texas, as United States representative at the United Nations.

President Nixon introduced Mr. Bush to White House newsmen as a man with "enormous interest in the United Nations."

Pending Senate confirmation early next year, Mr. Bush is to succeed Charles W. Yost, a career Foreign Service officer who the President said had left retirement in January, 1969, to serve with "great distinction" in the United Nations.

Mr. Nixon's first choice for the job was Daniel Patrick Moynihan, a White House counselor and urban-affairs adviser, who declined the offer and decided to return to Harvard University.

Mr. Yost had come from retirement after a career of more than 30 years in the Foreign Service, to take the U.N. post. He apparently now will return to retirement, although the President said that he was urging him to continue in government service, possibly in an alternative diplomatic post. Mr. Nixon said Mr. Yost had promised to keep the proposition "under consideration."

Mr. Yost told newsmen: "I have appreciated the opportunity to be the representative of the United States at the United Nations and have appreciated the strong support of the President and the Secretary of State in carrying out those responsibilities."

awesome responsibility."

The President made public an exchange of letters in which he told Mr. Yost he had helped the public realize "the full dimensions of the contribution which the United States can make and must make to a world of peace and justice."

Mr. Yost told newsmen he appreciated the "strong support" he had received from Mr. Nixon and Secretary of State William P. Rogers.

The President today sent the Senate his nomination of Frank C. Carlucci III, a former diplomat and assistant director of operations at the Office of Economic Opportunity, to succeed the O.E.O.'s Director, Donald Rumsfeld, whom Mr. Nixon aptation, disclosed that Mr. Yost had approached him in the early summer and expressed a de-
