

Ruritania, D.C.

"How oddly he is suited," observes Portia in Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice. "I think he bought his doublet in Italy, his round hose in France, his bonnet in Germany . . ."

President Nixon bought the $10,000 worth of comic opera uniforms for his White House police right in Washington, D. C., but the effect is no less foolish. One look at this Ruritanian get-up, and the question leaps to mind: Whatever did become of that "respectable Republican cloth coat?"
