

James Keogh
has worked as a reporter,
Time editor, and staffman for President Nixon.

What he has learned about the conduct of the press toward the presidency has impelled him
to write this book.

Charging anti-administration bias, James Keogh documents his criticism of nationally syndicated columnists Jack Anderson and Marquis Childs, New York Times staffer Tom Wicker, Nicholas von Hoffman of The Washington Post, and the editorial staffs of Newsweek and Time.

"Some of Keogh's arguments hit home." — Time

"He insists that . . . the mistreatment has been so gross and so constant as to reflect upon the integrity of the press itself. . . . [Keogh] is an old pro, and his studying indictment is a thoroughly professional job. . . . Keogh has carved up his one-time brothers. They will soon be slicing back."

— James J. Kilpatrick

"A serious . . . documented argument."

— The New Republic

"A fascinating account of the journalistic attacks that our strongest presidents have had to endure."

— Clare Boothe Luce

"James Keogh's book is a powerful exposé of the inbred, conformist mentality of the liberal media — networks and press. . . . [His] 1968 documentation strongly reinforces my own data in The News Twisters. Ignore his report at your peril."

— Edith Efron
