The Major Events of the Day

International

Greece made a concession in the Cyprus crisis by agreeing to replace the 650 Greek officers in the Cypriote National Guard. The officers led the coup that deposed President Makarios and that brought Greece and Turkey to the point of confrontation. The officers' total withdrawal was a major demand of Turkey. [1:8.]

Nikos Georgiades Sampson, the newly proclaimed President of Cyprus, charged that the ousted regime of Archbishop Makarios had systematically tortured its political opponents and "flagrantly violated" the human rights of all Cypriotes. He attempted to support his allegations at a chaotic news conference by parading purported victims of torture. [1:2.]

Archbishop Makarios arrived in New York from London and said he wanted the United Nations to condemn the coup in Cyprus, which he called a "violation of the independence of Cyprus by the Greek junta," and to ask that Greek officers be withdrawn from his country. He also told reporters that he was "satisfied—so far" with Washington's actions since the coup. [1:2-4.]

Kang Shin Ok, a prominent South Korean lawyer and advocate of civil liberties, has been arrested, his associates disclosed, apparently because he had denounced the military judge who had imposed death sentences on several of his clients, including the poet, Kim Chi Ha. Kim Young Sam, the vice president of the New Democratic party, the major opposition group, was detained for interrogation, apparently only for a brief period. [1:1.]

National

James D. St. Clair, President Nixon's defense lawyer, told the House Judiciary Committee that a 1973 tape recording that Mr. Nixon has refused to give to the impeachment inquiry would prove that Mr. Nixon had ruled out a "blackmail" payment to E. Howard Hunt Jr., a convicted Watergate burglar. The belated introduction of the evidence—a two-page edited White House excerpt from the transcript of a 90-minute meeting between Mr. Nixon and H. R. Haldeman—thus appeared to have left unsettled the central impeachment issue of the
