Turkey and Greece appeared to be moving closer to a full-scale military confrontation over Cyprus, massing forces on their common border and clashing directly in a naval engagement in the Mediterranean. Diplomatic efforts in various capitals failed to ease the crisis. Turkish forces held a wide beachhead on the north coast of Cyprus and a corridor to her inland capital of Nicosia, and Turkish planes and ships appeared to control the skies and the surrounding waters. [1:8.]

The Turkish General Staff announced that there had been a sharp battle off the coast of western Cyprus between a Greek naval unit and Turkish naval and air forces. The Turkish communiqué said that the Greek vessels had been intercepted by Turkish planes and ships and that a landing operation at Paphos, a port on the southwest coast of Cyprus, had been halted. [1:6-7.]

The international diplomatic effort to avoid a full-scale war between Greece and Turkey encountered trouble when both sides were unable to agree on arrangements for a cease-fire in Cyprus. The American Under Secretary of State, Joseph J. Sisco, who has been flying between the Greek and Turkish capitals, appeared to be having considerable difficulty in getting the two sides to agree to a truce. [1:5.]

Hundreds of people fleeing Cyprus arrived at a Royal Air Force Base in southwest Britain telling grim tales of shooting and bloodshed following the Greek-led coup. A Dublin man said: "People who were told by Makarios to lay down their guns were shot out of hand by the National Guard. They were buried in many graves. I saw para-troopers all over the place and nobody seemed to know quite what to do." [1:6-8.]

Albert E. Jenner, Jr. has been replaced as counsel to the Republican minority on the House Judiciary Committee. Mr. Jenner, a Chicago lawyer, supported the recommendation of John M. Doar, the committee's special counsel, that the Senate vote to impeach President Nixon. "We're not looking to him [Mr. Jenner] for advice on anything any more," said Representative Edward Hutchinson of Michigan, the committee's Republican. Mr. Jenner has been
