The Major Events of the Day

International

A Socialist oriented newspaper and a Roman Catholic radio station in Lisbon remained under control of Communist-led workers yesterday as the ruling military council debated how much leeway to give workers in national affairs. After marathon sessions that began last Friday, the High Council of the Revolution, a military group led by President Francisco da Costa Gomes, was reportedly preparing to announce a decision today. An inquest jury of six men and three women in London took only 30 minutes to write another chapter to what has been Britain's most intriguing criminal case in years. It named the seventh Earl of Lucan as the murderer of his children's governess, Lord Lucan vanished on the night of last Nov. 7, when the governess was killed. He is entitled to a jury trial if he returns. [1:3-4.]

Secretary General Waldheim of the United Nations opened the first major world conference on the status of women, in Mexico City, with the declaration that the equality of rights between men and women has become "a matter of vital necessity." He said that women's rights had too long been regarded as a "luxury" and called for a concerted world effort on behalf of women similar to one waged against racial discrimination. [1:1.]

National

President Ford asked Congress to enact laws that would impose mandatory minimum sentences for certain violent or dangerous Federal crimes and for certain multiple offenders, with a shift of emphasis from protecting the rights of criminals to insuring those of their victims. He presented Congress with a long list of criminal justice reforms that he said were urgently needed. Mr. Ford also said that, while he remained "unalterably opposed to Federal registration of firearms, Congress should ban the domestic manufacture, assembly or sale—but not the possession—of handguns known as "Saturday night specials." [1:8.]

Completing nine days of debate, the House passed a scaled-down energy tax bill—a bill that was once intended to be a major part of the Congressional alternative to President Ford's energy conservation program. Sup-

CORRECTIONS

An article in The New York Times yesterday incorrectly reported the total value of personal income in the United States in May. The correct amount on a seasonally adjusted annual rate is $1,211.9-billion.

In the Entertainment for Children column in The Times yesterday, the dates for Walt Disney films being shown at several theaters in the city were erroneously listed. The films will be shown June 25 through July 1.
