The Major Events of the Day

International

As Prime Minister José Pinheiro de Azevedo of Portugal denounced growing anarchy in the country and a lack of discipline in the armed forces, a rally in Lisbon, called by Socialists and Popular Democrats in support of his Government, was broken up yesterday by tear-gas bombs and gunfire. Panic followed as people tried to flee. It was estimated that 30,000 to 40,000 people had crowded into Government Square, many waving red Socialist flags and orange banners of the Popular Democrats, chanting "socialism yes, dictatorship, no." [Page 1, Column 5.]

King Hassan II of Morocco called off his people's annexation march into Spanish Sahara and said that the take-over would have to be accomplished by other means. He told the marchers—about 150,000 had crossed the border—to return to their base in Tarfaya, Morocco, and repeated the order three times in the course of a 10-minute radio and television address. "We must return to our points of departure," he said, "the volunteers to Tarfaya, your humble servant to Marrakesh." His tone subdued in contrast with the religious nationalistic fervor with which he had appealed to his subjects to begin the march three weeks ago. He said that the march had achieved its objectives, but the order stunned his entourage. The order followed a meeting he had had the day before with a Spanish official, Antonio Carro Martinez. [1:4.] The withdrawal was greeted with relief in official and diplomatic circles in Madrid. [1:1.]

On the eve of a vote by the General Assembly of the United Nations on a draft resolution that was termed Zionism "a form of racism and racial discrimination," leaders of American-Jewish organizations told United Nations officials and delegates that approval may provide a pretext for some countries to impose restrictions on Jews. Efforts by some United Nations delegates to avoid a vote on the resolution apparently have failed. [1:5-7.]
