The Major Events of the Day

International

A State Department spokesman said in Washington that in recent months the Soviet Union had sharply reduced the level of microwave radiation beamed at the American Embassy in Moscow. He nonetheless rebuked the Russians for continuing the waves even at the current insignificant level, and said that they thus showed a lack of concern for the living and working conditions of Americans. A correspondent visiting Lhasa from Peking reports that in the former holy city of Tibet, Peking-style maxims in Chinese and Tibetan have replaced the traditional mantras painted on walls and rocks. Modern Lhasa is like other towns of frontier China, with wide streets, new low buildings, industries, and department stores stocking sensible and enjoyable goods. The Jokhang, a temple dating from the seventh century and a focus of Buddhist pilgrimage, is now little more than a museum. [1:2-3.]

At a meeting in Monte Carlo of the International Lawn Tennis Federation, the United States Tennis Association did an about-face in deciding against withdrawing from the Davis Cup International tennis competition. Britain and France, which in sympathy with the United States had withdrawn from the Cup for one year on the ground that it had become too political, also reversed their decision. The three had cited Mexico's refusal to play South Africa as the latest example of politics in tennis. [1:2-3.]

Queen Elizabeth II was received at the White House with top-grade honors, looking cool despite Washington's sultry heat. The state dinner at the White House was televised live, the first time this had been done. Earlier, the Queen, Prince Philip and the Fords had a private lunch in the family dining room. [1:4-8.]

National

Authoritative government sources in Washington said that the likelihood of delay in the scheduled July 1977 start-up of the Alaska oil pipeline has increased because of problems with the pipeline company's records of quality-control radiographs of its welds. At the same time Interior Secretary Thomas S. Kleppe has advised President Ford that the pipeline service company expects no consequential delay. [1:6-7.]
