WASHINGTON, June 14 — Roles in the planning of the Watergate burglary and the subsequent cover-up were attributed to the following high White House and Nixon campaign officials today by Jeb Stuart Magruder, deputy campaign director:

H. R. HALDEMAN, former White House chief of staff—Mr. Haldeman's office received documents detailing the burglary plans, although Mr. Magruder said he did not know whether Mr. Haldeman saw them. Mr. Haldeman knew the full Watergate story in mid-January and was planning to commit perjury at the Watergate trial.

JOHN D. EHRLICHMAN, former chief White House domestic adviser—Mr. Magruder said he assumed at the time the plans were being made and the cover-up plotted that John W. Dean 3d, the ousted White House counsel, was receiving instructions from Mr. Ehrlichman, but Mr. Magruder has no direct evidence of Mr. Ehrlichman's involvement.

John N. Mitchell, campaign director until July 1, 1972 — Mr. Mitchell gave final approval to the plans for the burglary, having rejected two broader espionage proposals. He helped concoct the cover-up story and rejected Mr. Magruder's offer to take blame for the burglary.

Mr. Dean— Mr. Dean participated in early meetings at which the burglary was planned. He played the key role in developing and maintaining the cover-up. He had a pipeline to the prosecutors and was able to tell Mr. Magruder in August that Mr. Magruder would not be indicted. He did not conduct a White House investigation of the Watergate case.

Charles W. Colson, Presidential adviser — Mr. Colson urged in early 1972 that espionage plans be expedited and spoke of the need to gather derogatory material about Lawrence F. O'Brien, Democratic national chairman. Mr. Magruder said he did not know that Mr. Colson had been aware of the actual burglary or the cover-up.

Mr. Magruder himself — he helped plan the burglary and devised the cover-up. He offered to take full blame for the burglary. He perjured himself before the grand jury and the court at the Watergate trial.

Gordon C. Strachan, Mr. Haldeman's deputy—he served as liaison between the re-election committee and the White House. He received daily reports from Mr. Magruder and thus knew of the burglary and the cover-up. He prepared summaries of these reports for Mr. Haldeman to read. He read the Watergate wiretap transcript.

G. Gordon Liddy, counsel to the re-election committee and the finance committee—he was the author of the plans for the burglary.

Maurice H. Stans, campaign finance director—he was told the general facts of the Watergate operation, although not many specifics, on June 24 by Mr. Mitchell and Mr. Magruder.

Hugh W. Sloan Jr., campaign treasurer — he knew that a cover-up existed because he had given large sums of money to Liddy, but he did not know what was being hidden.

Herbert W. Kalmbach, Mr. Nixon's personal attorney—he raised the money to pay defendants in the Watergate trial.

Robert C. Mardian, political coordinator—he participated in meetings during which the cover-up story was constructed.

Frederick C. LaRue, assistant to Mr. Mitchell—he attended meetings at which the burglary was planned and also those at which the cover-up was devised.

Kenneth W. Parkinson, re-election committee lawyer — Mr. Magruder gave him a full and accurate account of the burglary in early July, 1972. Subsequently, however, Mr. Parkinson was told that the original account was not accurate and that the cover-up story was true.

Herbert L. Porter, campaign scheduling director — he was asked by Mr. Magruder to lie at the Watergate trial, and he did so.

Richard G. Kleindienst, former attorney general — he refused to let James W. McCord Jr., one of the conspirators, out of jail the day after the burglary.

Clark MacGregor, campaign director after July 1, 1972—He was lied to about the Watergate operation and did not know the true story during the campaign.

Powell Moore, campaign press aide — he went with Liddy right after the burglary to ask Mr. Kleindienst to get McCord out of jail.
