WASHINGTON, June 19 — Representative Shirley Chisholm of Brooklyn has put a roadblock in the way of a $775,000 settlement of a lawsuit of the Democratic National Committee against the Committee for the Re-election of the President.

Mrs. Chisholm said today she had refused to sign a waiver that would bar future lawsuits against Republicans who engaged in dirty tricks during the 1972 Presidential campaign.

The waiver was part of the settlement worked out by the Democratic National Committee and President Nixon's re-election unit. Other candidates have either signed waivers or planned to do so, a Democratic spokesman said.

Mrs. Chisholm protested that the 1972 Democratic candidates had no say in the negotiations that led to the agreement. She said she planned to file suit against Donald H. Segretti, who served a term in prison for his role in the campaign.

Mrs. Chisholm, who became the first woman to run for President, said through an aide that she had hired a lawyer and was preparing a libel suit against Mr. Segretti. The aide said Mrs. Chisholm objected to handbills distributed by Mr. Segretti during the California primary that falsely accused her of having been a patient in a mental hospital and of being a transvestite.

"I will not gratuitously acquit those who were responsible for intentionally launching the activities of saboteurs whose sordid crimes seriously samed the public election process in 1972, and in my case caused intense personal humiliation," Mrs. Chisholm said in a statement. "I insist that there must be definitive assignment of responsibility for this kind of conduct," she added.

The Democratic National Committee brought a $6.4-million suit against the re-election committee, as well as its finance unit, the Finance Committee to re-elect the President, accusing the Republicans of wiretapping, invasion of privacy, trespassing and conspiracy to commit various civil offenses. One of the crimes was the break-in at the Democrats' National headquarters, then situated in the Watergate complex.

In a settlement still being negotiated, the Republicans agreed to pay $775,000 to the Democrats. Included in that settlement was an agreement that all candidates who were targets of dirty tricks in California would not file further damage suits.

Vince Clethas, director of communications for the Democratic committee, said no one knew what effect Mrs. Chisholm's action would have.

The other candidates were Senators Hubert H. Humphrey of Minnesota, Henry M. Jackson of Washington, George McGovern of South Dakota and Edmund S. Muskie of Maine.

The aide to Mrs. Chisholm said there was "something inherently wrong with a process where a person who is not part of the negotiations ends up party to the agreement."
