

Money Warnings at the White House

A major reason why the Western White House has finally begun displaying a sense of urgency about the economic crisis was a secret warning from President Nixon's favorite pollster that a serious money panic really does impend.

Albert Sindlinger, the Philadelphia-based consumer opinion analyst whose daily national telephone polls regularly go to the White House, was stunned by the turn his surveys took two weeks ago.

About two months ago, Sindlinger added this question to his survey: Have you heard rumors that leading corporations and banks may be in trouble? At first, only about 20 per cent said yes. But two weeks ago, that figure jumped to 60 per cent. What's more, 15 per cent indicated a desire to withdraw their personal deposits.

A highly agitated Sindlinger descended on Washington to button-hole anybody he could find: White House communications chief Kenneth Clawson (his normal contact), officials at the Office of Management and Budget (OMB), several sub-cabinet members and a long, bipartisan list of senators (with Sindlinger sitting in on a Capitol Hill luncheon of conservative pro-Nixon senators last Tuesday).

Sindlinger's message was desperate: The American people, having lost confidence in their politicians and institutions, have little left but faith in the dollar. If that also goes, we may be vulnerable to a man on a white horse.

"Pollster Sindlinger's panic is credited as helping to end the inexplicable do-nothing mood in the administration."

Consequently, it behooves the administration to do something and do it quickly.

Sindlinger's panic is credited by high officials as helping to end the inexplicable do-nothing mood in the administration, where there seemed so little prospect to action that William Simon, Secretary of the Treasury, felt safe enough to take a two-week mission to Europe and the Mideast. Early last week, OMB was finally ordered to crank up options for the President, and his top economic policymakers (minus Simon) were summoned to San Clemente for emergency conferences.

So high is the priority that the Nixon administration puts on decontrolling petroleum that Treasury Secretary William Simon last Tuesday sent a cable from Cairo to Sen. Henry M. Jackson pleading with him not to take quick action extending the allocations act.

"There has been only a few months of experience with the act and we believe the act has been creating disturtions," cabled Simon, who asked for "thorough hearings."

Simon's persuasiveness, often compelling in person, failed at trans-Atlantic distance. Jackson will ask his Senate Interior Committee to quickly extend the authority without hearings at tomorrow's meeting. Without controls, Jackson believes, independent refiners and markets will be driven out of business by the major oil companies.

A footnote: Simon's intense desire to decontrol petroleum is not shared by bureaucrats inside the Federal Energy Administration (FEA). Since their jobs are secretly lobbying against the administration policy. Furthermore, congressional Democrats believe FEA chief John Sawhill, while loyally supporting decontrol, has private misgivings.

Riding in a first-class seat on a Los Angeles-Washington flight July 7, H. R. Haldeman, President Nixon's former chief of staff, got into a conversation with his seatmate which revealed that both his arrogance and his isolation from political reality have survived his fall from power.

Haldeman was obtrusively seeking solace from the man sitting next to him, whom he had never met before. Instead Haldeman received a judicial review of the Watergate scandals, summed up with the remark that the courts had been too lenient in some of the sentences imposed.

Haldeman listened, then tried to argue his seatmate into a different position, playing heavily on the alleged national security issue as the underlying cause of the scandals. But he could not budge the man beside him.

So, after a few minutes, Haldeman exploded: "This is the first time I have talked to someone who isn't supportive of my position and the President's." He then reached under the seat in front of him for his briefcase, muttered good-bye and moved across the aisle.

A footnote: Lawrence Higby, Haldeman's top sergeant in his glory days at the White House, is moving back up in the official presidential family. Exiled for a long period to a cubbyhole in the Executive Office Building after Mr. Nixon was forced to fire Haldeman, Higby is now top aide to Fred Malek, No 2 man in the Office of Management and Budget. What's more, Higby was summoned to San Clemente last week to sit at the highest level in policy conferences.
