Nixon Increasingly Yields In Clashes With Congress

By JOHN HERBERS

While the impeachment drive was. against President Nixon has been attracting widespread attention, a related development has consulted Congressional has gone virtually unnoticed: leaders of both parties more That Mr. Nixon has made im- often on the wider range of isportant concessions of author- sues than was his practice. ity to the Congress that must Over the last few weeks, when decide whether he remains in the President was in Washing-there have been recent actions frequently entertained members such as the following, that go of Congress aboard the Presito the heart of the struggle for dential yacht Sequoia. power between the legislative and executive branches:

icy, to testify before Congreshe must preserve the long-asserted Presidential prerogative that White House aides are not subject to the same Congressional scrutiny as are Cabinet the Senate.

The effort that Mr. Nixon undertook early in 1973 to impound at will funds appropriated by Congress and to end by Executive order some programs established by Congress have now been abandoned. The President also signed legislation providing for Congressional review of impoundments that may be necessary for the economy or other reasons.

authorities Congressional. have noted that the Administration is more cooperative in providing Congress with information and access to officials

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, July 28 — of the executive branch than it ton, there was a steady stream This trend has been under of Senators and Representatives way for several months, but into the White House, and he

A little more than a year ago, Mr. Nixon was challenging Con-The standard of the standard o agreed to permit Kenneth Rush, ment and restrictions on Conhis counselor for economic poltion and aides, he was attemptsional committees. He had been ing to reshape areas of the strongly opposed to such a step, Government without Congreshigh Administration sources sional authority and to effect said, because he had felt that important foreign and domestic policies without Congressional Congressional participation. leaders were fighting back.

Now, according to a number of authorities, the balance of pointments are confirmed by power is close to where it was and there are no indications of

Continued on Page 10, Column 1

White House. Still Uses Veto

Still Uses Veto

Throughout the last few months, Mr. Nixon has continued to exert his authority on legislation. He has continued to veto bills, even though some members of Congress say he has not been as bold in the use of the veto as he would have been had the impeachment drive not been under way.

Mr. Nixon was reported at the time to be strongly opposed and determined not to give in. After a few days, however, he did. Administration sources said it was felt that he could not at this time afford a struggle with Congress relating to Congressional authority.

On impoundment, the Adminitration had lost a series of court battles on the issue and that Mr. Nixon has made, however, are in the area of Congressional authority and prerogatives that Congressional In California Is Uncertain rogatives that Congressional leaders over the years have jealously guarded. The use of the veto is considered in Congress to be a legitimate exercise of Presidential authority. Wiping out programs enacted by Congress is not.

Mr. Nixon's concessions on impossible and on allowing specifies that any officeholder.

Traditionally, Presidents have Continued From Page 1, Col. 4 Economic Advisers until the President agreed to allow Mr. Rush to submit to Congressional questioning.

Mr. Nixon was reported at of the veto as he would have been had the impeachment drive not been under way.

For example, Senator James A. McClure, Republican of Idaho, said last week that he expected Mr. Nixon to sign recently enacted legislation creating a legal services corporation even though it ran counter to the Nixon policies. The White House announced Thursday that the President had signed the legal aid bill.

"The President is trying to stay in office, and his staff assumes that means trying to placate everybody," Senator McClure said. "That means playing both sides. It can't be done."

With Congress relating to Conmitted gressional authority.

On impoundment, the Administration had lost a series of court battles on the issue and Roy L. Ash, director of the efforce of Management and Budget, said on June 29 that the economic reasons for impoundment were not as compelling as they had been.

However, last year, the Nixon White House pledged to fight the impoundment issue all the way. Much of the effort was not so much to achieve fiscal restraint, as to allocate resources according to the Administration's formula and to eliminate expenditures that it considered wasteful or ineffective. It is that battle that has now been given up. The important concessions now been given up.

In California Is Uncertain

Mr. Nixon's concessions on impoundings and on allowing Mr. Rush to testify were made under pressure, but it was not considered likely Mr. Nixon would have given in so easily on either had it not been for the impeachment inquiry.

A Usual Presidential Stance

A Usual Presidential Stance

The State any officeholder is disqualified by conviction of a felony, but conviction by a jury does not mean immediate removal from office, according to a spokesman for the State Attorney General's office.

"Such removal is predicated on sentencing by the judge," The State Government Code specifies that any officeholder on sentencing by the judge,' said Jerry Littman, chief of the Attorney General's information

Traditionally, Presidents have resisted Congressional attempts to question their top aides on policies. Mr. Nixon himself has rejected a number of requests for such testimony on the ground that it would violate the separation of powers.

Mr. Rush, however, was given unusual authority as a Presidential counselor—coordinator of economic policies throughout the administration. When George P. Shultz held that role he was, in addition to being a Presidential assistant, testimony.

Senator William Proxmire, Democrat of Wisconsin, threatened to hold up Senate confirmation of Alan Greenspan as a member of the Council of in receiving the news here."

on sentencing by the judge, said Jerry Littman, chief of the Attorney General's information services.

Mr. Reinecke was convicted yesterday by a Federal jury in Washington of lying to the Senate Judiciary Committe.

Agnew Silent on Nixon

BAHRAIN, July 28 (Reuters)—Former Vice President Spiro T. Agnew, i nkuwait on a private visit, refused to comment to impeach President Nixon.

Asked if he had been keeping up with the committee's hearings, Mr. Agnew replied: "I've been keeping up with events, but we're a little behind time in receiving the news here."