

Memo From John J. Miller

MMARTHA MITCHELL met Ann-Margret's manager, Allan Carr, at a party and before the evening was over, Martha had talked him into managing her. The first thing Carr did was book Mrs. Mitchell on "The Hollywood Squares" as one of the celebrity panelists. Paul Lynde was all set in advance to give her any tips she needed to play the game — as if Martha needed any tips at playing games. When the big day came, everyone was set — except Martha, who never showed up. Her new manager, Carr, hasn't even been able to find Martha since, so he doesn't know what to do about booking her on several other TV shows that wanted her. One of the problems with communications is that Martha's estranged husband, John Mitchell, just dealt her a crippling blow by having the telephone company in New York remove all the phones from her apartment. She couldn't stop them because the phone was still in John's name and he'd been paying the bills for her to talk to people all over the country. Martha, meanwhile, says she can't have the phones put back in immediately, because at the moment she's flat broke.

MARTHA MITCHELL

Can you picture Woody Allen as Henry Kissinger? Well, Richard Zanuck and David Brown, the producers who brought you George C. Scott — think Woody would make a perfect screen.

They've
Back-