

Ramparts Pierced

Magazine's Strange Burglary

By Jack Viets

The Broadway bastion of muckraking Ramparts Magazine—guarded by a tiny monkey named Henry Luce—was breached by mysterious and messy burglars early yesterday.

"It's very confusing," said Ramparts publisher Edward Keating. "Ramparts has been struck back."

The burglar — or burglars — jimmied a way into Ramparts offices at 301 Broadway sometime between 2 a.m., when the last sleepy staffer left — leaving Henry Luce securely shut in his cage — and 8:30 a.m., when the same sleepy staffer returned to his desk.

He walked in to find the offices in a non-professional mess, Henry Luce, an obvious suspect, was still in his cage.

When Keating was notified, he settled back in one of the huge black leather chairs in his office and tried to deduce why anyone would want the wad of missiog bank statements going back ten years which was taken from his office.

HENRY LUCE, OFFICE MASCOT
Only he saw the odd incident

"They also tool my personal file dealing with the Warren Commission's report," he said. "I don't see a pattern."

Although Ramparts recently exposed the undercover role the Central Intelligence Agency has been playing within the National Student Association, Keating said he doubted the burglary was committed by an angry arm of the Federal government.

"The CIA or the FBI would have slipped in here and photographed everything they wanted and then slipped out — and nobody would have ever known about it."

But on the other hand, he speculated, maybe the burglar was in truth "tremendously clever — and covered up by being made to look clumsy."