

Warren Visits His Old Office

Sacramento

Chief Justice Earl Warren paid a visit to his old office in California's Capitol yesterday, and said he was relieved that the investigation of the assassination of President Kennedy is over.

"This has been a long and depressing job," Warren said as he viewed a color photograph of the late President and Mrs. Kennedy on the wall of Governor Edmund G. Brown's office.

"This has been a tough thing, living with this thing for ten months—along with other work," Warren said. "Certainly, I'm glad its over."

Warren, three-term Republican Governor of California before his appointment as U. S. Chief Justice in 1953, is paying his annual visit to his home state.

Warren came to the capital from San Francisco with an old friend, retired Sacramento city manager Barley Cavanaugh.

The two plan to attend the World Series next week, as they have done each year for the past ten years.
