ber 31, 1961, speech. duras (Belize) from Britain in exchange for the rebel bases. This deal was implied by President Ydígoras in a Decemaid in the transfer of the disputed colony of British Honthe United States made no commitment to Guatemala to bases to the United States. But it is virtually certain that also arranged, as in cases when a foreign government leases It is not known whether any financial quid pro quo was the funds, the equipment and the instructors for the tebels ing about an invasion being planned against their island and a good deal more about the preparations. By July chances are that Castro's ubiquitous agents heard the joke working level, the arrangements were being handled by the officials were aware of the furtive negotiations. On the larly referring to the "Cuban Invasion Authority," and the CIA and its mysterious colonels. Soon the Cubans began jocu-1960 Castro and Cuban propagandists were continually talkluctant to discuss the details, it can be assumed that its Although the Department of State is understandably re-

The United States denied it loudly, and indignantly.

however, in the negotiations. assistance for Guatemalan and Central American coffee with Cuban exiles in Miami. When Roberto Alejo came to staff discussed the operation openly in letters exchanged and Carlos Alejo-Roberto's brother-was and is the Guategrowers, he pointedly reminded American officials that the houses for invasion preparations. Members of the Embassy malan Ambassador to the United States. Guatemala's Emof his ranges near the town of Retalhuleu available for the a wealthy coffee planter named Roberto Alejo made one of Retallhuleu was chosen as the site of the first bases, and first Cuban rebel base was on his finea. It helped him little Washington in the summer of 1961 to negotiate financial bassy in Washington soon became one of the clearing project. The Alejo family is close to President Ydígoras, proceeded apace. The mountainous Guatemalan department the physical preparations for the building of the rebel force With Guatemala as a firm ally in the secret undertaking would be in conjunction with the clandestine opposition supply missions for the Cuban underground since, in those airstrip in Retalhuleu to serve the emerging rebel air force. days, the prevailing thinking was that an attack on Cuba Guatemalan soldiers and CIA operatives began building an on the island. The long-range strategy was to use rebei The strip was needed for the aircraft to be used in flying By late July, hand-picked workers watched closely by > $ 75 foreces when the myoured for a general apriling began getartet affen f et all a nigen da Bila Calmina andante prote je talat decen the form of the states and traderical from Kin K to Boot.

eral agencies frequently found themselves working at cross partiality with the pro-Castro and anti-Castro agents. purposes. Thus federal agents interfered with splendid imwas a breakdown of coordination and the CIA and other Fedin preventing unauthorized flights from Florida. But there working through the Border Patrol, had finally succeeded Tederal Aviation Agency and the Immigration Service the risk of discovers in the United States. Additionally, the The thing had to be done faver trustemals because of

and as we shall see, this led to the discovery of the whole model of the B-26 in Castro's possession-was overlooked aerial deceit. same planes from Batista. But one detail-the particular ease on their missions over Cuba. The B-26's were given to the rebels because Castro had inherited a group of the Castro Revolutionary Air Force, could operate with more and Democratic Front agents combed Florida for refugee were unmarked. Camp facilities were presently erected. CIA force so that rebel aircraft, painted with the insignia of the plicate in Guatemala the models used by the Castro air CIA provided them with a number of obsolete World War tors. Some of the planes carried USAF markings, others II B-26 bombers and C-47 transports. The idea was to du-As soon as a nucleus of rebel aviators was established, the pilots for the Cubana Airlines and the Cuban Air Force tary equipment, supplies, fuel, volunteers, and CIA instrucin Panama began landing on the new strip, bringing milicraft from the mainland and from the Caribbean Command In Retalhuleu, meanwhile, United States transport air-when the big fight came. were enough to knock the rebel aviators out of the sky to have three T-33 jet trainers which, as it developed, ers and that Cuban air cadets were taking jet training in ready known that Castro was importing Soviet MIG fightnascent rebel army was being equipped in Guatemala with erational. Perhaps it could not have been helped, but the a round-trip to the island was too great to make them op-Czechoslovakia. Even without the MIGs, Castro was known lumbering and obsolete aircraft at a time when it was alnot given fighter aircraft because the distance involved in Force fliers from a jet fighter squadron. The Cubans were The Cuban pilots were checked out by United States Air cration, six other training camps were successively established in Guatemala. One of the big camps was at the Helvetia ranch, not far from the air strip. Another was set up near a shrimp factory on the Pacific coast. Two smaller camps were placed in Northern Guatemala, dedicated mostly to guerrilla training. The most promising guerrilla leaders, some of them veterans of the Sierra Maestra campaign at Castro's side, were sent for advance training to the U. S. Army's Jungle Warfare School at Fort Gulick in the Panama Canal Zone.

While Retalhuleu thus became the air center for the op-

いりょうとき

Small camps and shipment centers were set up in the Florida swamps. One camp was established in Louisiana, where the swampy terrain was reminiscent of the Ciénaga de Zapata where the rebels were to land the following year.

<

The smooth progress of military organization, however, was not matched by political developments. The loudly proclaimed unity of the anti-Castro elements dissolved almost at the moment of its inception. The confusion was soon compounded by the appearance, in an already crowded arena, of new, important anti-Castro groups holding highly independent views.

The first schism occurred within the ranks of the Movement of Revolutionary Recovery and involved Captain Artime. Initially, the break concerned personality, but it soon became ideological as well. Less than a month after the "unity" Front was founded, Artime came into conflict with a faction within his own MRR led by Major Nino Díaz, and by Major Ricardo Loríe, a one-time Castro pilot. The two apparently resented the commanding manner of the smooth-talking young captain, and whispers began circulating that Artime was developing into a budding dictator. Artime, for his part, was annoyed that Díaz and Lorié—two of the founders of the MRR—disputed his leadership.

Whatever the precise causes, the split grew deeper. Miami's hothouse atmosphere of exile intrigue abetted the schism. Finally, one day in July, Lorié Díaz and several companions burst into the apartment of Pepita Riera, an anti-Castro radio announcer, breaking up a political meeting that was being held there and administering a sound thrashing to Artime. Thus, before they were ready to attack Castro, the rebels were investing increasing energy in battling each other.

tling each other.

The split within the MRR and the beating given Artime

84

But the CIA depped in to protect its young favorite. By the CIA depped in to protect its young favorite. By this time, it is probable that Bender and his colleagues had already settled on Artime as the putative Castillo Armas of the invasion army; CIA was not going to permit exile squabbling to upset its plans. This incident foreshadowed a trend which reached the incredible point, early in 1961, of the imprisonment of Artime's opponents and their ejection from the secret army.

Another political complication within the Democratic Front revolved around Sanchez Arango, a forceful and impatient personality who evolved from communism, in his youth, to a rightist orientation. In time, Sanchez Arango quit the Front and switched to another anti-Castro group in which he cooperated closely with Eusebio Mujal, who had been president of the Cuban Labor Confederation under Batista.

As airline flights from Havana daily disgorged new loads of refugees from Cuba, anti-Castro political movements began to proliferate at a dizzying rate. As summer gave way to fall, Miami began to take on the characteristics of a Cuban city, and it seemed as if every Cuban of any consequence started his own movement of liberation. Some were fly-by-night groups centered about an ambitious politician and his immediate family. Others were more substantial. One calculation asserted that there were more than fifty separate Cuban movements in Miami, merging and dividing like amoebas. Still other movements flourished among exile colonies in Puerto Rico, Caracas and Mexico City. In Florida, radio stations beaming programs to Cuba offered a nightly selection of speakers, each representing a different group.

It was not surprising that Castro's opponents within Cuba soon became disgusted with the political carnival in the comfortable haven of Miami. Presently, a powerful new underground movement came into being. Its emergence coincided with the entry into conspiratorial activities of Manuel (Manolo) Ray, a young American-trained engineer who had directed the sabotage section of Castro's "26th of July Movement" in Havana during the civil war and who later became Minister of Public Works in the revolutionary regime. Ray resigned from the cabinet in November 1959 when the moderates were being purged by the radicals. For nearly six months, Ray's friends in the new anti-Castro underground urged him to join in the nascent struggle against the regime. For six months, Ray resisted the blandishments and concentrated on teaching architecture at H_{α} vana. University, Finally, in July, Ray decided that the revolution could no longer be saved and threw himself heart and soul into the conspiracy. Ray's own decision coincided with that of a large number of once devoted Castro supporters in the rebel army and in the government, including Felipe Pazos, "Ché" Guevara's predecessor as head of the National Bank, and Colonel Ramón Barquín, the military ruler of Havana during the first days of Castro's triumph.

85

The idea of men like Ray and his companions was to restore the revolution to its original goals of political democracy and social justice. They stood firmly for the continuation of the social reforms initiated by Castro. Many of the early MRR followers, displeased with the Artime facton, turned to Ray for leadership. The underground movement these new insurgents created was given the name of Movimiento Revolucionario del Pueblo—the MRP—or People's Revolutionary Movement.

Ray quickly became a major thorn in Castro's side. The MRP grew from day to day, established national, provincial and local underground chapters, collected money, dispensed propaganda and practiced as much sabotage as could be accomplished without help from abroad. It was an action, not a debating society, but nevertheless received scant help. Although explosives and weapons were already flowing to Artime's MRR through air drops and clandestine maritime landings, no material was made available to Ray's MRP. Whatever help Ray did receive came from MRR underground units that were more disposed to cooperate with the MRP in Cuba.

At about the same time Ray helped to found the MRP, independent guerrilla operations came into being in Las Villas and Camagüey provinces, and especially in the rugged Escambray Mountains, where the anti-Batista Revolucionary Directorate had conducted its "second front" against Batista. Plinio Prieto, a tough one-time anti-Batista fighter, Captain Sinesio Walsh, and Captain Oswaldo Ramirez, both veterans of Castro's rebel army, commanded the new guerrillas. Catholic student organizations in Santa Clara, the capital of Las Villas, established contact with the Escambray units and took upon themselves the recruitment of volunteers and the sending of supplies. An 18-year-old Santa Clara university student named Porfirio Ramírez, who was president of the provincial University Students Federation, led the student underground. Support even came from the the the first of the forests of the forests in the field of the feeters for from Batista forces there from Batista forces three from Selection where the feeters before. William Morgan, the American veteran of the forests before. William Morgan, the American veteran of the forests before the historical who then operated a government frog farm, assigned his trucks to carry supplies to the rebels in the mountains. Ultimately, this gesture cost Morgan his life; young Porfirio Ramírez, too, was killed for his help to the rebels. The new anti-Castro movement was finding its heroes and martyrs.

<

By early fall, 1960, the combination of the Escambray guerrillas and the MRP underground in the cities was creating a situation of open rebellion against Castro. The two movements were not linked, but in their own ways they became the most important anti-regime operations in Cuba.

Yet the CIA strategists in Miami had little patience with the underground. It was not sufficiently conscious of "security," they said, and it was too difficult to get trained communicators into the Escambray with radios. But behind these objections was the Agency's enormous reluctance to give a blank check to any group beyond its control.

The MRP was then little known in Miami, since Ray and his companions were not politically represented in Florida. But the Escambray guerrillas could not be wholly ignored. Stories about their defiance of Castro were circulating in the United States, and the Premier made no secret of his concern about their progress. By September, he had moved powerful militia units to the foothills of the Escambray, and had taken personal command of the operation. His own experience in the Sierra Maestra taught him the danger of tolerating guerrilla force. Peasants and their not supply food to the guerrillas. Firing squads went back to work.

Nonetheless, by the first of the year Castro had still not beaten the Escambray fighters, despite their lack of food and weapons. Castro's personal physician, an Army major, was killed in a skirmish with the guerrillas, who controlled most of the big mountains.

This stubborn resistance had an impact on Miami, and with some reluctance the CIA drew up plans to help the Escambray insurgents. About October, Cuban rebel aircraft the effectiveness of the guerrillas had diminished, the flights were curtailed, and a long agony in the Escambray continued until almost the eve of the Bay of Pigs invasion, which, ironically, entered the island only 80 miles from the former rebel stronghold. weak transmitters desperately pleaded for help. But since fighting for physical survival. Anguished radio messages from of the movement had been broken, and the guerrillas were perimeter held by the guerrillas gradually shrunk. The parachuted supplies started falling into the hands of the miliands of Castro militiamen began to yield results, and the tia instead of the guerrillas. By mid-November, the back were too infrequent. Slowly, the pressure of the thousmitters. But it was an unenthusiastic effort and the drops to the Escambray, dropping food, weapons and radio transfrom Guatemala began flying occasional supply missaem nedy's election would bring an administration into power more disposed to work with the left-of-center MRP, Ray plead his case in person. arranged to be smuggled into Miami in November 1960 to clear. Growing desperate, but also hoping that John F. Kenthat it could not go on forever without material help from the United States. The example of the Escambray was cruelly through the MRP was growing in importance, Ray realized as the principal anti-Castro movement within Cuba. Al-The collapse of the Escambray resistance left the MRP prospects for the underground. sity of Utah. He was preoccupied but optimistic about the was good, learned during his student days at the Univerthan the usual full-blown rhetoric of Cubans. His English a young instructor, and was given to understatement rather his arrival. Deceptively soft-spoken, Ray had the manner of One of the authors saw Ray in Washington shortly after mounted a heavy garrison on the island. got a hint of the plot, transferred all prison personnel and insiders at the Isle of Pines prison, but Castro apparently that the plan had failed; it had relied on collaboration with the details. A few days later, Ray was downcast by the news free Matos that day, but that nothing could be said about with a flicker of excitement, that a plan was underway to as a symbol of what the movement stood for. He added, communist views. Ray said that the MRP looked to Matos ary hero who was jailed for "treason" for espousing anti-He was asked about Major Huber Matos, the revolution-and Washington hinged on the political desirability of an in-The argument that Ray presented to officials in Miami > would refuse to submit to political domination by the CIA by supplying it with arms and equipment--but the MRP telef army. The United States could help the underground followers and encourage defection within the ranks of the had to be becosed on attempts to wear away Castleia grown of martinement the contestabled that and a cotton actions diproduct tract that would have faithe walled the foul agreed to withdraw a letter he was sending to the New York Times outlining his difficulties with the CIA. It help without a new face, asked Ray to step down. ing that it would never get any favorable consideration for ship of the MRP after the invasion; the underground, feelis an ironic footnote that CIA enmity cost Ray his leaderone point, after a phone call from the White House, Ray marks before and after the invasion were circumspect. At of his detestation of Mr. Bender, although his public re-These conversations left no doubt that Ray was proud and in some ways a "difficult" person. He made no secret over by an exile front with a cautious, moderate program. help for the underground tied in with a left-of-center political program; the CIA was in favor of an invasion presided concepts of anti-Castro strategy collided directly. Ray wanted With Ray's arrival in the United States, the two basic guerrilla and underground groups on the island. The quick-talking, chain-smoking Cuban explained that his rebels were forces were even forming paratroop units. ships to carry out the operation. Artime added that the exile already in possession of the necessary aircraft and landing landings by rebel forces designed to link up with thirty planned strategy involving thirty simultaneous air and sea blueprints with one of the authors, Artime spoke of a ings tied in with sabotage and insurrection within the island. As late as October 1960, Artime himself gave high single, massive invasion. It talked in terms of multiple landpriority to underground help. Discussing the operational At this point, however, the CIA was not wedded to a to determine what led him to discard his own plans and Artime is being held incommunicado in a Castro prison in Havana, and until he is free to speak it will be difficult accept the CIA proposal for a one-shot invasion.

Control of the Contro

collapsing in Cuba, the CIA army was reaching a high degree of preparedness in Guatemala-after a fashion. Re-At the same moment that the Escambray guerrillas were Listed States and edit from the deadmated Nava and at Opasi ocka, near Mianii. Instructors were being assessibled from a number of improbable places.

allierer Man set ein gin aberen ge

A United States Army colonel known as Davis was directing the conventional warfare training. A Filipino colonel who had fought against the procommunist Huk rebels in his country was flown in from Manila to work with the guerrilla and infiltration teams. Several Eastern European specialists, possibly anti-Soviet Ukrainians, whom the CIA dunearthed somewhere in Europe, were brought to structions into Spanish, working with the training commanders.

But the entire operation was a study in military surrealism at least in the opinion of many Cubans who were there. Conventional solutions were proposed and executed for what was by definition an unconventional situation. Although it was obvious that a force of 1,500 to 2,000 men could not possibly defeat Castro in orthodox combat, the CIA planners built a miniature army on conventional lines. The Cubans were trained in World War II infantry tactics. They were provided with up-to-date weapons like bazookas, recoilless antitank guns and even a handful of medium tanks. It is difficult to imagine what kind of war the CIA was of guerrilla wars going back to the Wars of Independence, as operational problems the little army would have to face.

The guerrilla training offered in Guatemala and at the jungle warfare school in Panama, such as it was, was equally inadequate. In the opinion of the Cuban fighters subjected to it. Most of the Cubans were veterans of the discussing the subject. Their opinion is that the Guatemalan camps they were trained on a terrain of granite volcanic outcroppings that bore no resemblance to conditions they knew unsuited to the problems they would face at home. Several when they suggested that the training follow more closely In the end, a number of the Cuban guerrilla experts were expelled from the camps and returned to Miami.

By the end of 1960, the Guatemalan operation was nearing the periphery of public knowledge. Inquiring newspapertrially seen to see our street we become a facility of the control of the control

Although a good many perplexed Americans were inclined to discount the strange rumors about a rebel army, Fidel Castro followed the reports with the utmost concern. His network of agents in Central America and in Miami fed him the necessary details. He began a propaganda counteroffensive immediately, warning that an invasion was tion and charged that the Eisenhower Administration in its waning months would doubtless attempt an attack on Cuba. The militia remained under arms until Kennedy took office.

Havana and much of the Cuban coast soon bristled with fortifications. Gun emplacements dotted the curving seaside Malecon Boulevard in the capital, although it surely must have seemed unlikely to Castro that his enemies would wade into Havana Bay. But to further dramatize the peril, the Premier let it be known that strategic areas of the city were, or would be, protected by explosives and that coming its defenders.

It is probable that Castro was really convinced that an invasion would come about November. He kept hundreds of thousands of militiamen on the alert for nearly three months, although the mobilization took men from their jobs and the sugar harvest time was approaching. Hence Cuba's sinking productivity declined even further. Matters reached the point that Major Guevarra warned in a speech early to avert an economic collapse. Meanwhile, incredulous stunt and editorial writers remarked that the new Administration would be too wise to fall into such an obvious trap.

The day of President Kennedy's inauguration, Castro ordered a demobilization. He remarked with satisfaction that the Cuban show of force had prevented the invasion, an

7

of expectancy toward the new Administration. seemed to feel that the young President would radically alpropaganda was muted and Havana adopted an attitude ter Washington's policy toward Cuba. Consequently, Cuban argument that cannot wholly be dismissed. In addition, there is reason to believe that Castro hoped that Mr. Kennedy would seek an accommodation with revolutionary Cuba. He momentum of the CIA's pet project. same distaste for the Castro regime as did its predecessor. Operationally, as we shall see, it was caught in the growing But, on a political level, the new government had the

were swept from positions of influence. in which the liberal elements among the Cuban exiles fect, presenting his new Administration with a fait accompli CIA moved to strengthen its hold over Guatemala-in ef-A few days before President Kennedy's inauguration, the willed officer with a rightist reputation. ship. Villafaña was the head of the exile air force, a strong-Cubans, he was closely identified with the former dictatorthe Batista Maestra region. In the eyes of most anti-Batista come the CIA favorite. San Román was a former officer in officers, the assembled men were told, were Captain Artime, enjoying the special confidence of the United States. These anti-Castro army was being placed in the hands of officers charge and informed that the new military leadership of the Artime was the youthful member of the front, who had be-Captain José P. San Román and Captain Miguel Villafaña. Guatemalan camps were summoned by the CIA agents in Guatemalan camps. On January 18, the rebel troops in the to accept tacitly, took the form of a coup d'état in the This move, which the impotent Revolutionary Front had

who had resigned his regimental command in protest over ot Staff," Colonel Martín Helena, a professional army officer associates arranged for the dismissal of the Front's "Chief army. In Miami at the same time, the CIA and its Cuban Batista's 1952 coup d'état. numerous units, including some five battalions of the rebel Other officers identified with the right-wing school of including Batistanos, were given command of consulted about the purge, the CIA came to rely extensively in its political activities on a shadowy group known around Miami as the "Cuban CIA," and built around the intelli-While the Front's leadership, except for Artime, was not

> STAIN SALL BONNE BONDERSON BARLESON, & KAMERIN OF BEARING BURGETTE, ENG BROWNER periodica nel current less ether silvering. Since hermal cit ethica experiodicaries were in the planning and execution of the assault on Cuba. choice of which Cubans would be permitted to participate in a villa in Coral Gables, the intelligence group had the tions reached the final stage. Working from its headquarters the opening months of 1961, when the invasion preparalise Subjeties operation acquired considerable power in market and smuggling it into Cuba aboard their own boats had to plead, bargain and fight for every pound of plastic explosives and for every submachinegun. Ray's agents obeven though the MRP operated the most successful under-ground network in Cuba. While explosives, weapons and tained additional supplies by purchasing them on the black arations most of those who had cooperated with Castro in the early days of the revolution and who held reasonably progressive or liberal views. The foremost target was were not objectionable to the CIA's field operators, the MRP money flowed to Artime's MRR and to other groups that invasion this organization was deprived of any assistance, Manuel Ray's MRP, and during the months preceding the This power was reputedly used to eliminate from the prep-delismo without Fidel," whatever that was supposed to mean Cuban opponents as a dangerous movement advocating "Fi-Thus in the critical weeks preceding the invasion, the principal underground organization in Cuba was ignored time, the MRP was being described by its American and by the very people who were planning the assault. At this tain Napoleón Becquer, had escaped from prison to try to on" against Castro. Some of them, like their leader, Capcommander was arrested and sentenced to prison for "treasguey and who had made their way to Florida after their had belonged to the garrison of Major Huber Matos in Camano fighters representing a different political approach. This was from the Escambray encirclement were similarly treated. join the anti-Castro war. Guerrilla fighters who had escaped particularly and astonishingly true of a group of officers who vasion because those who directed the operation wished to have leaving for Guatemala even in the days preceding the ingroups of experienced guerrilla fighters were prevented from These wrong-headed activities went even further. Important be no Batistanos among the Cuban freedom fighters. Simi-President Kennedy has publicly assured that there would voritism for the pro-Batista groups continued even after The exclusion of politically "unsound" fighters and fa-officers who served in the Batista army were acceptable if they had a "clean" record. Miami and Guatemala. CIA higher-ups seemed to feel that was going on in the secret little fiefdoms springing up in his intelligence chief had any idea of the meaning of what Dulles, and it can be assumed that neither the President por lar assurances were made privately by CIA Director Alten ingion. action was taken with the consent or knowledge of Washand kept there under guard. It is not known whether this on the outskirts of Miami, near a spot called Bauer's Road, CIA and the Front's intelligence operatives to a farmhouse to go to Guatemala. But they were taken instead by the tingent and more than 100 MRP volunteers were ordered from above. A week before the invasion, the Becquer conbattle, the CIA operatives found ways of ignoring directives the MRP-forced on a reluctant CIA by the White House -called for the MRP's full participation in the approaching Although a last-minute agreement between the Front and ordination" of refusing to serve under Batista military ofby lough American CIA agents—imprisoned for the "insubcording to their subsequent testimony, they were guarded Guatemalan province of Peten until after the invasion. Aclawyers-were kept in a series of improvised prisons in the Miami, but a hard-core group-including several young the spot. Most of them were released and shipped back to had objected to the Junuary coup d'état were arrested on In the Guatemala camps, more than 200 troops who make their periodic, morale-building inspection trips. the Guatemalan camps. But his colleagues continued to ing any public charges, he refused from that point to visit dez-rebelled against it. Although he refrained from makat least one member of the Front-Justo Carrillo Hernán-When word of these high-handed tactics reached Miami, of their stand against the increasing communist inroads in many of them had been in Castro's prisons precisely because Cuba. was implied that they were unreliable anticommunists, although reliable and dangerous elements who had to be weeded out. It the rightist leaders installed in the invasion army were un-The CIA's position was that the insurgents who opposed could not have been brought into the operation because the secrecy of the whole venture had to be protected. But those who advance this implausible case were oddly remiss Subsequently, the claim was made that the underground > and Flagler Street. meetings in the bars and hotels along Biscayne Boulevard what was happening as if he himself had sat in on the their unteliable and dangerous elements out. As it was, ing indiscretion that Castro in Havana was as aware of the Miami operation was conducted with such astonishmainable were on speaking terms with the CIA to weed without effect was made by I ederal authorities - who gre-The second of the second of the second second of the second secon THE P. S. SEASON MADE MANAGER & MALTEN PROPERTY FOR in the dark to assure that a post-Castro regime contained no and political friends. There was still one more arrangement apparently, for the CIA operatives and their Cuban business troublemakers. But even the pre-invasion purges were not enough,

A CONTRACTOR OF THE PROPERTY O

X

This top-secret project was known as "Operation Forty," and was set in motion in early March by Sanjenis and the intelligence branch of the Front.

a kind of "civilian-military government" that would move in fighters could realize what was happening. the national and local governments before the underground on the heels of the invading army and take control of but enough is known to indicate that it was intended as Many details of "Operation Forty" are still shrouded, was being organized, it is worth remarking, the Kennedy noncommunist but advanced social revolution in Cuba. unreconstructed antirevolutionaries. As "Operation Forty" Administration was eloquently affirming its support for a "Cuban CIA" was going to plant what at best can be called difference is that Guevara planted procommunists, and the tors behind in every town and village in his path. plains of central Cuba and left his political indoctrinapolicy of "Ché" Guevarra when he swept down into the Curiously, the "liberators" were planning to repeat the

was reported to be Ramón Calviño, a Batista police torturer, confusion of battle, such killings could go unnoticed and the victims depicted as communists. One of the potential killers which might oppose a return to the good old days. In the also had a second task: that of assassinating, if necessary, fessional killers who were to eliminate obdurate elements political leaders who stood in the way. It was reported that the project included a hand-picked task force of pro-According to well-informed Cubans, "Operation Forty" captured by Castro's militia. In history's strange way, Calviño a seaman who had been smuggled on shipboard and who soke himself was executed. sequently went ashore with the invading forces and was

Batista regime. and file were free of any connection whatsoever with the had bad records and the overwhelming majority of the rank 35 members of the invasion force were Batista soldiers who the Cubans who enlisted in the invasion forces. Only some obscured the character and motives of the vast majority of The saddest aspect of all these blunders was that they other sad circumstances surrounding a venture over which daredevil youth. Their gesture was gallant-whatever the entered the invasion force with the boundless enthusiasm of men who genuinely wished to restore freedom to Cuba. They they had pitifully little control. were ready to risk their lives to eject a dictator and they They were brave, headstrong and democratic-minded young chance to attack Fidel Castro's Cuba. equipped by the CIA, who were restively waiting for a what to do about some 1,500 men under arms, trained and Mr. Kennedy's inauguration, and the problem, basically, was on President Kennedy's desk. The time was shortly after Intelligence Agency, used to describe an inherited problem phemism that Allen Welsh Dulles, director of the Central "The disposal problem." This was the crisp eucadre was a contingency operation; ineluctably, the force service. When President Eisenhower first authorized the foran operational venture in the nether world of the secret a classic instance of how a contingency plan can become grew-and so did the plan. templated a massive one-shot invasion. Instead, mation of the exile cadres in March 1960, no one con-The outcome of the "disposed problem" developed into

CHAPTER SIX

THE DISPOSAL PROBLEM

The wheel turned, a new President assumed office and combinations that played a vital part in resolving the "disposal of the mood, the psychological flavor and temperamental Operation Plato. But it is possible to reconstruct something step to dep program that furned the disposal profiless and Share treets included had all the Jacts are and because of the desired the management of the same of the street of the street of the street of the state of the state of the state of the The same as a second of the second of the second who could coolly estimate the odds and take a chance. schools, both were fiercely ambitious, and both were men a background of family wealth, both attended respectable playing boldly for the highest stakes. Both had in common tro and John F. Kennedy, the young adversaries who were First, there were the opposing personalities of Fidel Casto the words of the Establishment hierarchy. uniform), Kennedy at that time gave considerable weight for the counsel of men of rank (especially if they wore a effective political management. Whereas Castro cared little White House not as an innovator but as a specialist in of advice, a heeder of expert opinion. He came to the ies of traditional society. In contrast, Kennedy was a seeker little respect for the wisdom of his elders or the mystera sword in his hand as an avenging revolutionary. Fidel had ever environment, Castro surely would have wound up with But Castro was a rebel and Kennedy was not. In what-cially anxious to bring off a victory in the first months, to certify his title to office by popular acclaim. his narrow win over Mr. Nixon, the President was espenedy came into the White House as the youngest elected President, and he was palpably aching for greatness. After Castro had already been in power for two years; Ken-less, irritatingly ambiguous, seemingly unbudgeable slagheaps thwarting complexities, the Congo was a mess. of frustration. Laos was slowly slipping away, Berlin presented countered a no less disheartening array of problems-shapebeing stifled in the cloakroom. Abroad, the President enintended to insure that his program would at least escape a Congress with a reduced Democratic majority in which he was barely able to win a House Rules Committee fight Yet what did the President confront? At home, he faced virtue of his campaign speeches, the President was pledged to do something about Fidel Castro. An instrument was at Then there was Cuba, so temptingly close to home. By his respected senior advisers urged him to "let er rip hand in the form of the CIA plan-and, as we shall see can sum up the personality of Fidel Castro; he presents an orchestration of dissonant themes. to his survival he is seldom a "romantic." No simple phrase pearance of boisterous disarray, but on those questions vital derestimated his adversary. Fidel Castro may give the ap-But, along with many others, the President seriously un-and there is the theme of purposeful reform. But mingled with all of this is the motif of cunning. Notwithstanding his enemies frontally; he goads them on to self-destruction. strategist in the tactics of entrapment. He does not meet his outward impetuosity, Castro has shown himself a gifted days when he delighted in spraying the beach with bullets, the theme of wanton destructiveness, evident from his boyhood bend his knees before a dogmatic political ideology. There is is his ambition to elevate himself-coupled with a need to nine tenderness-combined with crimson ruthlessness. There There is the theme of genuine compassion-almost femi-total of actual military casualties during more than two tista to destroy himself. (It is not widely known that the waited, he teased, and he finally conquered by forcing Baful of guerrillas to a frontal engagement with the army. He In fighting against Batista, Castro never exposed his hand-of the American government, and especially of the Central States in a self-destructive act of folly. With the cooperation Intelligence Agency, he succeeded. Base. He waited, he goaded, hoping to entrap the United military attack-he kept his hands off Guantánamo Naval provided the United States with a clear pretext for direct the United States. Despite threatening oratory, Castro never years of civil war amounted to not much more than 350.) The same stratagem was repeated when Castro took on Next Right." its existence advertised by disarmingly candid signs, "CIAquarters right off a four-lane highway in Langley, Virginia, except the director. But in America, the CIA has its headand only cabinet insiders know the name of any officer equivalents of CIA, are scarcely acknowledged to existwith as much extravagant ballyhoo as in the United States. The MI-5 or the Deuxième Bureau, the British and French no other country does an intelligence service operate

As with the plant, so with the personnel. The top men journalists with the inside dope. leading CIA operatives more than occasionally brief favored ment" Newspapermen have contacts at the Agency, and fixits, announcing mysteriously, "I work for the Governfluiteriest seem to pup up at every treorgetown cocklaid advant became, a total legher than that at the State De-44 dle Syones per Smare to Concentration during and and the கிற்களை இலங்கள் (இது சுரும் இது வரும் இரும் The contractions amaker for the f.A. in and to complet to the second of the second nel to incredulous reporters. service that has distributed press releases about its person-$1 billion a year. And surely the CIA is the only "black" dency became especially marked after the U-2 debacle, anxious to justify its enormous budget, said to be up to which put the CIA on the defensive and made its officers began quietly mentioning the Agency's victories, with the Guatemala operation appearing on every list. This ten-Possibly this helps to explain why CIA sources themselves his agency was not getting the public credit it deserved. tige, even men whose names should be kept out of the newspapers feel tempted to puff up their own achievements. in a country where celebrity is often a measure of pres-Allen Dulles, when he was director, was known to feel that thoroughly Americanized. Perhaps it is not surprising that In this sense, the "spooks" of the CIA have become even took to submitting stories on the Agency's activities to the CIA for "clearance." porters were briefed by CIA agents, and Miami newspapers States Information Agency. Newspaper and magazine reprojecting a favorable "image" of their effort as the United Florida and Guatemala seemed almost as conscious about men at the top; whatever the cause, CIA operatives in the April 17 invasion: the CIA's increasing involvement in the news. Perhaps agents in the field took their cue from the Thus there is a certain irony in one factor that led a loss of face. lem," the very publicity surrounding the operation made it impossible for the United States to extricate itself without President what he wanted to do about "the disposal probon American soil. By the time Mr. Dulles asked the new of a small-scale army secret-especially if the recruiting was The fact is that it was impossible to keep the organizing tige, money and personnel in a scheme that the organizaof no confidence in the CIA, which had invested its presture as a bad idea. This would have been taken as a vote Assume that the President wanted to abandon the vention adjudged sound. It would have been a blow to the Cubans who were supporting the invasion strategy, and who would be sure to say that the United States was a false friend and a paper tiger. It would have been gleefully hailed by Castro as proof that the United States had backed down.

Vistin

These were some of the threads in the net of circumstance. Once the original order to organize an army had been issued, and once the army became the best-known "secret" force in the world, the avenue of strategic retreat was sealed off. Like a djinn released from the bottle, the CIA's creation soon seemed to develop a will of its own.

In their first meetings, Mr. Kennedy made it clear that he did not want to commit any American forces directly in the enterprise. What could be Cubans do by themselves? What was the CIA estimate of conditions within Cuba? Could the CIA present a plan for using the force in a way that would not directly involve United States military intervention?

Allen Dulles obliged, and the "disposal problem" shortly moved into another stage as a specific plan was submitted to the scrutiny of the White House, the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the National Security Council.

III

Meanwhile, "new hands" grasped the levers of state. Inevitably, this was a period of transitional uncertainty and organizational groping as the Government underwent a dislocating change of administration. Nowhere was this more apparent than in the sphere of Latin American policy.

The President came into office brimful of good intentions; his campaign had pledged an Alliance for Progress aimed at giving Latin America massive economic aid and encouraging social reform. During the Christmas season, the President's aides conferred in Puerto Rico with Governor Luis Muñoz Marín, and there was a mood of buoyant enthusiasm about the tasks ahead.

But a familiar problem recurred. The President had no one in his immediate entourage who knew anything about Latin America. During the campaign, his speeches on hemisphere policy had been handled mainly by Richard N. Goodwin, a bright, articulate, 29-year-old Harvard Law School product who had clerked for Justice Felix Frankfurter and who had worked on the House Oversight Subcommittee's expose of Charles Van Doren before joining Senator Ken-rates that the the mould be default to nothern because the free feeds cheef adjudent on Later Ansets are reattern. It is to exclude, still new in the job and uncertain of his terrain eatherd little personal authority in the discussions of the Cuban plan.

A SECTION OF THE PROPERTY OF T

cratic friends in the same fashion as the Marshall Plan. choose sides—and once again the United States had to do the same. He would also liken the hemisphere crisis with Alliance for Progress, aimed at strengthening our demotive step to contain communism. Coupled with it was the would reason, is like the Truman Doctrine, a negathe postwar period in Europe. The action against Cuba, he firm authority, the United States forced Latin America to etration was abetted by Juan Perón. Then, by a show of prewar period in Latin America, when extensive Axis pen-First, he would say, there were parallels with the immediate of the past. The 65-year-old braintruster was fond of using dency to see current developments through the spectacles two analogies to explain United States policy toward Cuba hemisphere policy, Mr. Berle was handicapped by his tennew Administration as the chief of a nebulous task force istrative confusion. A stout champion of a prodemocratic on Latin America that generated both new ideas and admin-Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs. He joined the served as FDR's Ambassador to Brazil and as Assistant An "old hand" from New York came down to help out. Adolf A. Berle, Jr., was a veteran New Dealer who had

Working with Berle on many aspects of hemisphere policy was Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., the Harvard historian who had joined the White House staff as a kind of troubleshooter. A shrewd veteran of intelligence service during World War II, Schlesinger brought a discreet skepticism to bear of discussions of the invasion proposal. But as a Harvard don new to the seat of power he was diffident about using his sharp tongue.

These three—Goodwin, Berle and Schlesinger—tended to fill the void in Latin American policy, a void partly caused by the Kennedy Administration's inability to recruit a suitable appointee for the job of Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs. During the first months, an Eisenhower holdover, Thomas C. Mann, stayed on the job. Mann, a cautious career officer, was appointed at his own request as Ambassador to Mexico in early April. It was not until June, after more than twenty candidates had been considered, that the post was finally filled by Robert Forbes