

... they would not make sense in the early destruction of the Hunt files, one thing in particular we should keep in mind. If dean felt as represented, the the obvious thing to do was to arrange for their quiet disappearance. This would have been simple enough. But no, he involved many, including the chief Gestapo. Who destroyed, unseen?*. One obvious possibility is that he wanted this to get out of his hands and known. He had no reason to assume Gray would read, would destroy, would be silent. Every reason opposite this. The questions this thing raises about Hunt need no elaboration. If he could do these things, what could he not do, how sick is he, how irresponsible, how dedicated, how persuaded that he alone understands truth and real patriotism. Need one add and what true patriotism requires? If it may mean nothing, it can't be ignored. HW 4/27/73
