The Week and Contage W. Clement Stone beat the Senate Watergate committee and special prosecutor Archibald Cox to the punch by making full disclosure of his $7 million in campa on contributions and loans. Stone, as the No. 1 political angel, uncoubtedly will be summoned to testify by both the committee and Cox when each gets around to announced plans to investigate campaign funding... One practice that will come under study will be the dodge employed by both political parties in establishing dubious committees during a presidential campaign, which are little more than paper organizations, to accept the maximum contribution of $3,000 from an individual (or $6,000 from a couple). Setting up hundreds of these committees enables the wealthy to circumvent the intent of the last.
