WASHINGTON, May 22 —

The National Security Council staff headed by Henry A. Kissinger is losing at least three more members and there are unverified reports that two others are also quitting.

These departures follow resignations by six Council staff members last year.

Leaving are Laurence E. Lynn, director of the Council's program analysis staff; Roger P. Morris, who has been handling special projects for Mr. Kissinger, and W. Anthony Lake, of Mr. Kissinger's personal staff.

It is understood that Mr. Lake is leaving for a number of reasons, one of which is his objection to the Administration's military operations in Cambodia. Mr. Lynn said he was leaving for personal reasons.

Sources report that other Council staff members share Mr. Lake's concern about policy in Cambodia and are also unhappy about their personal working conditions.

The members of the staff who are said to be leaving could not be reached for comment, and others would not speak for publication. Asked about the resignations, Mr. Kissinger said he preferred that his assistants speak for themselves.

The Council staff does research and policy planning in foreign affairs. Its job is essentially to provide the Council, headed by the President, with information, options and advice on national security issues.

Departures Expected by Fall

It could not be determined why the 32-year-old Mr. Morris was leaving. He has not yet set a date for his departure, but it was reported that he planned to leave before the fall.

It is understood that Mr. Lynn, who is also 32, will leave in late summer to take a teaching position at the graduate school of business at Stanford University.

Mr. Lynn is said to be leaving the staff because of the pressures and long hours.

Those familiar with the Council staff report that two more of Mr. Kissinger's assistants either have resigned or plan to do so. They say that a number of factors have led to unhappiness among other Council members.

One of the major causes of disenchantment appears to be the Administration's decision to mount military operations in Cambodia. Another seems to be the heavy demands that Mr. Kissinger makes on his staff in terms of workload and hours — demands that are said to be communicated sometimes in peremptory fashion.

Those who left the Council staff last year are Dr. Morton Halperin, Richard M. Moose, Richard V. Allen, Lawrence S. Eagleburger, Daniel I. Davidson and Richard L. Sneider.
