

Orders for White House's Staff

WASHINGTON — (UPI) — Charles Colson, a top White House aide, has issued this directive to his staff: "Think to yourself at the beginning of each day, what am I going to do to help the President's re-election today?"

And, at the end of each day, Colson instructed, "Think what you did, in fact, do to help the President's re-election."

The Washington Post published the memo from Colson to his subordinates today. It said:

"There are 71 days left between now and the election. Every single one of these is a campaign day and or those of you who have not been reminded of this lately, every day has 24 hours."

Colson, the President's special counsel, said he would be "very intolerant of less than maximum output."

He continued: "No one should plan any trips anywhere without my express approval. No one should ever be out of reach of the telephone. The White House switchboard must know at all times where everyone is . . ."

Colson said he was "totally unconcerned with anything other than getting the job done."

There was no immediate reaction from his staff.
