Anthony Ulasewicz, the former New York City detective who became a courier of Watergate hush money, was indicted by a New York federal grand jury yesterday on two counts of income tax evasion.

The grand jury that returned the indictment in U.S. District Court in Brooklyn said Ulasewicz reported gross income of $27,068 in 1971 and $18,434 in 1972, "when he knew and believed he received substantial gross income in addition to that." The indictment did not say how much income he received in those years.

In announcing the indictment, the Justice Department declined to say whether any of the unreported income came as a result of Ulasewicz' actions ferrying large sums of money from Herbert W. Kalmbach, at that time President Nixon's personal attorney, to several Watergate defendants, including E. Howard Hunt Jr.

At the Senate Watergate committee hearings in July, 1973, Ulasewicz told of using phony names and coded questions, making money "drops" in telephone booths and airport lockers, and carrying a coin changer like bus drivers used to use so that he would have enough change to be able to make his phone calls only from "safe" telephone booths.

Ulasewicz testified that he received his first shipment of hush money just two weeks after the June 17, 1972, Watergate burglary—$75,100 in $100 bills given to him by Kalmbach. He said he put it in a laundry bag and carried it from Washington to New York City on June 30, 1972.

In addition, he said, he got $40,000 from Kalmbach at the Regency Hotel in New York in July, 1972, another $28,900 at the Washington Hilton later that same month, and then $75,000 at the Airporter Inn in Los Angeles in August, 1972.

Ulasewicz retired from the New York City Police Department in 1969, and served as an investigator on political spying projects for President Nixon through 1972.

The indictment said he reported as 1971 income $284 in interest, $16,506 from his business as a private investigator, and $10,278 from a New York City pension.

For 1972, the indictment said, he reported $273 in interest, $5,000 in business earnings, $10,355 from the pension, $2092 in wages and $714 as a state income tax refund.

He testified at the Watergate hearings that he received $22,000 a year from Kalmbach.
