

New Job for Man Who Told of Nixon Tapes

Washington

Alexander Butterfield, who revealed the existence of Richard Nixon's White House tapes, has a new job as executive vice president of a California-based air service company.

James C. Jack Jr., president of International Air Service Co., Ltd., announced the appointment in a statement issued yesterday. He said Butterfield, who formerly headed the Federal Aviation Administration, will oversee the firm's operations and will help the company negotiate the purchase of Aloha Airlines of Hawaii.

Jack said the company, with headquarters in Burlingame, deals in leasing of U.S. flight crew services, air charter services, aircraft sales and maintenance. He said Butterfield will move from Washington to Menlo Park next month.

Butterfield, who once served as a White House aide, disclosed in hearings before the Senate Watergate committee on July 16, 1973, that Mr. Nixon had installed a recording system in the oval office to tape his meetings and telephone conversations secretly. This information helped lead to the President's resignation.

Butterfield recently said in an interview that he had been unable to find a job since leaving the FAA.
