gression of their military careers.

This conformed with recent statements by Defense Secretary Melvin R. Laird and Army Secretary Stanley R. Resor, proclaiming that the men—who were charged with murder and conspiracy in the alleged killing of a South Vietnamese, Thai Khac Chuyen—would be considered innocent unless proved guilty in a court of law.

During a question and answer session after his speech at the National Press Club on Sept. 25, Secretary Laird told reporters that "these men are innocent until they are convicted of a crime."

And Secretary Resor commented that "the determination of guilt may be made only by a court" when he dismissed the charges against the men on Sept. 29 for lack of available C.I.A. witnesses.

All seven assignments were in the United States, and four were specifically made to military intelligence units, which is the area in which the seven men were trained.

An Army spokesman said that the other men would also probably be given military intelligence duties, but that these were not mentioned in their assignments because of a state of the Army believes this is a the first major application.

Green Beret Terrorism To the Editor:

One of the most frightening aspects of the Green Beret murder case is the apathetic public reaction to the accompanying focus of attention upon the role of our Special Forces. Apparently many Americans have no difficulty in accepting the fact that we must now resort to assassination and other practices of questionable morality which we have formerly delighted in attributing to the enemy-whoever he might be.

This acceptance seems to be based on the assumption that the successes achieved by Communism are a direct result of the employment of terronistic methods and the only way we can hope to compete is by adopting the same methods ourselves.

Perhaps the question we should now be asking ourselves is just how far we can afford to go in the use of terror to defeat terror before it really won't make any difference who DANIEL F. HALLORAN wins. Albany, Sept. 29, 1969
