The agency confirmed an official announcement today by Georgetown University, a Jesuit institution in Washington, that C.I.A. recruiters who had been scheduled to visit that campus this week were receiving applicants instead at a permanent C.I.A. personnel office in a nearby Rosslyn, Va.

Rosslyn is an area of suburban office buildings and shops close to downtown Washington and about five miles from the C.I.A.'s headquarters building at Langley, Va. Students from other Washington-area campuses will also be interviewed there rather than at college placement offices "because we have our facilities so close at hand here," an agency official said.

Other Transfers Noted

C.I.A. recruiters also transferred scheduled campus interviews today at Syracuse University and the University of Rochester an agency spokes Rochester, an agency spokesman said, because of threatened student demonstrations. Applicants were met in offices in Federal buildings in the two New York cities.
