By Lewis H. Diuguid for safe passage out of Chile.

The Chileans for the most | But for thousands of other eigners cast adrift by Chilean coup has made the old government of the late Presi-uation is far more compliwill be flown abroad.

Washington Post Staff Writer SANTIAGO, Oct. 1—"The part were major figures in the Latin Americans here, the sit-coup. Latin custom of political asylum obsolete," said A. U.N. official, throwing up his hards

of them are under arrest

cated, and often equally grim.

To handle them, the U.N. High charges by the junta that foreigners who entered the counafter almost three weeks of most of them are under arrest or have taken asylum in Latin embassies from which they sought and received the cooperation of the military junta part in the Allende governin setting up havens for for ment.

the

Chile, historically hospitable eigners who entered the coun-

The fact that Chile was such free and easy place contributes to the confusion. By the leans who have been urged to the refugees count there are 13 000 denotes the confusion of a free and easy place contributes to the confusion. By the junta's count there are 13,000 foreigners—"for the most part extremists"—in the country without proper documentation.

Another 4,000 employees of various international organizadenounce any suspicious acts the refugees. by foreigners.

Enrique Iglesias, secretary general of the main U.S. organization based here, the Economic Commission for Latin America, spent the first week after the coup establishing the inviolability of U.N. of-

The military generally accepted the immunity of the lenting to diplomatic requests diplomatic corps with the exception of the Cuban mission, in these few which was accused of intervention in Chilean politics, U.N. people, including a cou-ple of Cuban doctors, went through some harrowing experiences before their status was sorted out.

Most non-Latin foreigners' situations are now close to Americans who were detained after the coup have been released through the efforts of the U.S. consulate, and have left the country.

Some 2,500 Americans are registered with the embassy, and most of their relatives at home sent cables asking about their whereabouts. As of now, the embassy lists no Americans dead, and two missing.

The United States and Euro pean nations did not sign the Treaty of Caracas that establishes the principle of asylum and safe passage abroad for victims of political upheaval.

Nevertheless, several European embassies opened their

Another European embassy is more discreet. After the Chilean staff has left for the day, the wife of the ambassador starts cooking curried chicken for half a dozen Chileans who are called to dinner from the closets where they pass the daylight hours.

cases even though no treaty obligation exists.

At the Latin embassies. where the right of asylum is well established, thousands have sought refuge. The Panamanian embassy, which is about the size of a large din-About two dozen ing room, took in 600 people.

Down the street at the Venezuelan embassy, Ambassador Orlando Orlando Tobar estimates that 2,000 have passed through the gates. A Hercules transport from Caracas has flown out more than 300, and at least that many Chileans and foreigners are camping on the grounds, sleeping on the floors, and lunching on the food that the transport plane brought from Caracas.

Some of the cases remaining are very ticklish. Seven Venezuelans here with out-of-date or inadequate documents took refuge in their embassy even though they are on the wanted list at home for involvement with that country's violent takeover in Uruguay, and Argentina's new President Juan Peron offering no hospitality to Marxists, their problem now is where to go.

One of the first leftist intellectuals to leave after the coup was Spaniard Joan Garces, who was a close adviser to Allende. His departure proved difficult and embarrasing because it turned out that he was here under UNESCO sponsorship.

In general though, the bigger names have fewer troubles getting permission to leave the country. A lot of penniless Chileans and foreigners may have more difficulty. Hence the feverish establishment of the U.N. refugee program to help the non-Chileans.

Working in conjunction with the churches, U.N. representative Oldrich Haselman supervised the establishment of 26 processing centers and two havens—where refugees may live safely until they leave the country.

Ads are running in the newspapers offering help in obtaining documents or renewing expired ones, and in leaving the country if neces-sary. On the first day, some people responded to the ads.

The U.N. officials emphasize that the junta has been doors to Chilean Marxists left.

and other refugees fearing reprisals from the military. The intellectuals who moved to gees will soon be solved.