

Marcello 'Tests' to Take Term

By CHARLES ZEWE

Carlos Marcello probably will spend his entire six-month prison term in a federal prison-hospital at Springfield, Mo., prison officials said today.

Charles Campbell, director of the Federal Medical Center at Springfield, said medical tests being given Marcello probably will last the length of his prison sentence.

The 60-year-old rackets figure entered the south Missouri prison more than a week ago to serve six months for a conviction of attempting to strike an FBI agent.

IT WAS reported shortly after his arrival at the prison that if medical tests proved Marcello physically able to undergo "regular" prison life he might be moved from the predominately treatment facility.

Campbell said today, however, the tests probably would be stretched over the length of his term.

"The tests being given Marcello are prolonged over an extended period of time and they will probably last until his six months are up," Campbell said.

Marcello was convicted in 1968 of attempting to punch FBI agent Patrick J. Collins at New Orleans International Airport in 1966.

THE ALLEGED Mafia boss was sentenced to two years in prison originally but the term was later reduced to six months. He fought imprisonment for more than four years in a lengthy set of legal proceedings which were twice brought before the U.S. Supreme Court.

Campbell said Marcello apparently is accepting his imprisonment calmly and as a "matter of course."

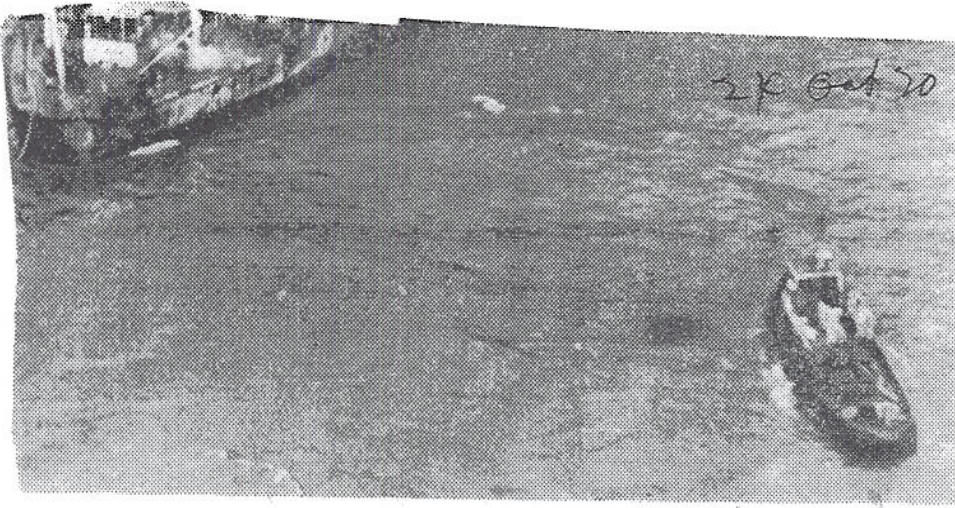

"He's following a day-to-day routine similar to other inmates here," Campbell said, "and we've had no problems with him whatsoever."

About 850 federal prisoners are confined at the high-security center located about 200 miles southeast of Kansas City. The hospital, the only one of its kind in the United States, is for federal prisoners with medical and mental problems.

ALTHOUGH MARCELLO is confined to the hospital ward for most of the day, Campbell said there are occasions when he can go outside into the chilly Missouri weather for exercise if he so desires.

Campbell said Marcello also has had visitors since entering the prison. He was not specific as to who had visited Marcello but added visitors normally are limited to members of an inmate's immediate family, friends and attorney.

neys, all of whom must be approved by the center.

Overall operation of the center closely parallels that of a regular general hospital. Meals are served inmates in their beds and the hospital is equipped with the latest medical devices, including an up-to-date intensive care unit.

CAMPBELL SAID Marcello probably will be given a certain degree of social work counseling during his stay at the prison.

Social worker talks with prisoners are limited to patient-inmates whose sentences are relatively minor or who are about to be released. The social workers also communicate to Marcello's family reports on his condition and any messages he may have for them.

There are no work release programs or weekend visitation rights extended to good behavior prisoners at the institution.

"We don't have that sort of program because we usually just get prisoners in here from throughout the country for medical treatment and then get them out as soon as we can," Campbell said.

Supreme Court Gets Marcello Case Appeal

U.S. Attorney Gerald J. Gallinghouse and K. Eric Gleson, special attorney for the Justice Department, have appealed a federal court ruling dismissing an indictment against Carlos Marcello which charged him with being in the United States illegally.

Formal notice of the appeal was filed yesterday with the U.S. Supreme Court.

The indictment of Marcello was dismissed last month by U.S. District Court Judge Lansing L. Mitchell in New Orleans, who ruled that the five-year statute of limitations had run out.

Marcello was deported to Guatemala in April 1961 and was found back in the United States two months later. He then was indicted for illegal re-entry but that indictment was dismissed in 1965.

The latest indictment — dismissed by Mitchell, but now being appealed — charges that Marcello failed to apply to the U.S. attorney general for readmission and was found in the United States on June 17, 1970.
