

Incursion Spurs Light Protests in U.S.

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Feb. 8—The South Vietnamese incursion into Laos generated only scattered protests around the nation today, in marked contrast to outbursts last spring following the move into Cambodia.

Fourteen college-age youths broke into the South Vietnamese Embassy here this morning but caused no damage before eight were arrested. The Nixon Administration was apparently so unconcerned with the possibility of trouble there that no guard had been posted.

The State Department, which is responsible for notifying the Uniformed Executive Protective Service when embassy guards are needed, had no explanation. A spokesman said guards were assigned there later.

About 300 students marched across the campus at Stanford University last night, breaking windows and causing damage estimated at $13,500. About 200 students locked several trustees and administration officials in the business school today, demanding that the Stanford trustees sign separate peace with the Vietcong. The police dispersed the students after about two hours.

But at a noon rally of 500 people there today, the biggest cheer was for a black student who said that breaking windows was a waste of time because it took money away from scholarships and did not stop the war. A student reporter at the university of 11,500 students said the general mood was a feeling of futility.

In Washington, the National Peace Action Coalition, which claims a membership of 35 antiwar groups, called for large demonstrations. Jerry Gordon, the national coordinator, issued a statement urging Americans "to take to the streets and peac-fully demonstrate their opposition."

David Dellinger and Rennie Davis, antiwar leaders who were among the Chicago Seven defendants, addressed about 20 people in Lafayette Square across the street from the White House to protest the South Vietnamese action.

They called for demonstrations across the United States on Wednesday, including a New York "mill-in" at Times Square. Other sites would be military induction centers.

Mr. Davis said that "if the Government does not stop the war, we intend to stop the Government of the United States."

The National Peace Action Coalition has asked campus groups to organize demonstrations of their own and called an emergency planning meeting here later this week.

An antiwar conference has been scheduled for Feb. 19-21 to plan for demonstrations in Washington and San Francisco on April 24. That meeting, however, was called before the Laotian incursion.

The youths who broke into the South Vietnamese Embassy here came from the University of Pennsylvania and other schools in Philadelphia. They were identified by a student reporter as the "hard core of what's left of the New Left in Philadelphia."

He said that the antiwar movement at Penn was practically dead and that "nobody cares."

"This is just another maneuver so long as American troops are not going in," he commented.

He noted that the student daily newspaper did not even carry the news of the invasion.
