ARANYAPRATHET, Thailand, May 8—Two Red Cross nurses, one carrying a sick French infant, the other the child's intravenous feeding bottle held high, led the way today as the last group of foreigners to be evacuated from Cambodia crossed the border here.

The crossing, by some 550 foreigners of at least a dozen nationalities, began shortly after noon. Single file, carrying bulging suitcases, wicker hampers or children in arms, they passed slowly through barbed wire, across the rickety wooden bridge that marks the frontier and through an immigration tent.

This was the second group of foreigners to be evacuated from Cambodia. The first, numbering more than 500, arrived here last Saturday. [According to The Associated Press, some Westerners, including at least two Americans, were still believed to be in Cambodia.]

For 250 of the people who crossed today, the trip began early Tuesday in Phnom Penh, where they had been living in the French Embassy compound. At Battambang, in western Cambodia, more than 220 Pakistanis and several French citizens joined the group, which traveled by truck.

Jean Dyrac, the French consul, was the last to leave the embassy compound in Phnom Penh with the final group of foreigners, most of whom were French citizens. Those aboard the 28 trucks in the convoy included four American newsmen — Alan Rockoff, a freelance photographer on assignment for The New York Times; Lee Rudakewych of ABC News; Denis Cameron, a freelance photographer, and Richard Boyle of the Pacific News Service Syndicate.

The French infant who was carried across the frontier had been suffering from severe diarrhea for the entire trip. The child was taken by ambulance to a doctor in this border town.

As was the case with the first convoy, the trucks that arrived today had rolled slowly through Cambodia for 16 or more hours each day, stopping for one night at Kompong Chhnang and for the second night at Battambang.

Pakistanis who joined the convoy at Battambang told of having been driven from their homes at bayonet point by soldiers who fired in the air when the Pakistanis indicated reluctance to leave.
