UNITED NATIONS, N.Y., Sept. 30—The United States today vetoed the admission of North and South Vietnam to the United Nations in an action that found it isolated from its friends as well as its critics.

The Vietnamese states, in separate votes in the Security Council, received 14 of the 15 votes, but were blocked by the single negative vote of the United States.

The rejection had been anticipated since the United States last month vetoed their entry because the Security Council had refused to consider the admission of South Korea, pending since 1949.

However, third-world countries supported by the Communist members revived the Vietnam issue in the General Assembly, which on Sept. 19 voted 123 to 0 to ask the Council to reconsider and act favorably on the two Vietnam requests. The United States abstained in the Assembly along with eight other countries that habitually vote with the United States on political matters.

Supporters of North and South Vietnam, and Algeria in particular have sought to show that the United States is thwarting the wish of the majority, including its Western European allies, which have recognized the Hanoi and Saigon Governments.
