About 800 people at a May Day rally in Union Square heard speeches yesterday attacking the Nixon Administration's policy in the Far East.

The rally began with a parade by a group of about 75 who marched to Union Square from 38th Street and Eighth Avenue, escorted by a large detail of policemen. At Union Square, speakers demanded an end to the United States action in Cambodia and the liberation of the Black Panthers.

As speakers addressed the crowd, 10 members of the Neo-Nazi National Renaissance party picketed on the north side of 17th Street at Broadway behind barriers. Helmeted policemen separated them from taunting bystanders.

The Renaissance group carried a picture of Hitler and signs that read, "No Mercy for Red Traitors." Several times the police prevented onlookers from storming the barriers, but there were no arrests.

The demonstration lasted for 45 minutes and the police escorted the pickets to a subway station.

The May Day rally was sponsored by the New York Committee for May Day and the Young Workers Liberation League, two leftist groups. A banner behind the speakers said, "May Day, 1970, Peace and Freedom."

The march from the garment district, which proceeded along 38th Street to Broadway, then south on Broadway to Union Square, was led by Jose Ristourucci, who identified himself as a Communist party leader here.

Speakers at the rally also called for an "end to racism and repression" and for taking inflation "off the workers' backs."
