

Thousands in Mississippi Mourn Student Who Was Slain in Jackson

Associated Press

Warner Buxton, left, Jackson State student president-elect, shows shooting scene to, from left: Senator Edmund S. Muskie; Adrian Peterson, student; W. Averell Harriman and Senators Charles H. Percy and Ralph W. Yarborough.

MAY 23 1970

By JON NORDHEIMER
Special to The New York Times

JACKSON, Miss., May 22 —The second victim of the police shooting at Jackson State College was buried today, and the rich and the powerful came to Jackson to pay their respects and to express concern over this violent spring on American campuses. James Earl Green, 17-year-old student and part-time grocery clerk, was buried in the dusty Mississippi earth after thousands of mourners walked under a broiling sun to a little green cemetery one-half mile from where he and another Negro student were killed and seven others wounded by Mississippi state police last week. Gov. John Bell Williams amassed 1,300 National Guardsmen and a large contingent of highway patrol officers here in case of violence, which he said he feared. But the march was peaceful. "You've seen me here five times in 10 years," Charles Evers, the black Mayor of Fayette, Miss., told the 4,000 mourners who jammed the oppressively hot hall where the service for the dead student was held. It was

Continued on Page 13, Column 4