

POLL FINDS WORRY IN CAMPUS UNREST

Lists Issue First Ahead of War and Racial Strife

Special to The New York Times

PRINCETON, N. J., June 17—

Campus unrest is regarded by Americans as the country's leading problem, according to the latest Gallup Poll.

Until now, campus unrest has not been ranked higher than fifth on a list of problems regarded as the most important by the American people, the poll reported.

But according to the latest survey, campus unrest was ranked ahead of the war in Southeast Asia, other international problems, racial strife, the high cost of living, the polarization of the American people, teenage problems, crime and lawlessness, drug addiction and other problems.

Field work for the survey was carried out from May 22 to 25, when 1,509 adults were interviewed in more than 300 localities across the country.

War Had Been First

Campus unrest was listed as the leading problem by 27 per cent of those polled. The fighting in Southeast Asia was next, named by 22 per cent. Third was other international problems, named by 14 per cent.

A prior survey on leading problems was conducted in January, when the war in Southeast Asia was listed most often, followed by the high cost of living and racial strife.

The poll also reported that many college alumni believed that college facilities failed to give the same importance to the views of right wing, or conservative, leaders as they did to those of left wing, or liberal, leaders. Of alumni polled, 45 per cent agreed with that viewpoint; 39 per cent disagreed, and 16 per cent had no opinion.

Belief that faculties failed to give equal weight to the two political viewpoints was found to a greater extent in Eastern and Western states, the poll reported, than in Southern and Midwestern states.

The findings on viewpoints were based on replies of college-educated individuals who took part in the survey on the nation's leading problems. They constituted 24 per cent of those who participated in that survey.
